The Japanese have ingenuity and the entrepreneurial spirit and they are a great success. We should remember that just over 40 years ago the first atom bombs were dropped on Japan and it was defeated in war. Only 20 years ago it was the largest borrower from the World Bank for Development. Japan is now the largest contributor to the World Bank for Development. It announced a fortnight ago that its per capita income is greater than that of the United States. That is the change which has come about. Japan has seen rapid growth and it is surrounded by countries which have even higher rates of growth. That we must recognise.

Britain may be well towards the bottom of the list in Europe, but there are no European countries within range of the Japanese performance. The best European country in these terms is West Germany, and it is not within range. The same can be said of Switzerland and Sweden. The United States will be affected in exactly the same way. There is only one answer for us overall, and that is to deal with the European Community.

We are faced with the question of joining the European monetary system. When the issue of EMS was raised, the Leader of the Opposition laughed his head off. I did not understand why he reacted in that way. He was aided and abetted by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who opened the debate on behalf of the Opposition. The Labour party changed its policy after the 1983 election and said that Britain would remain a member of the Community. If we remain a member of the Community, we should be a full member, and that means being a full member of the EMS.

We are told that everyone in a responsible position, including the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Governor of the Bank of England, the leaders of the Confederation of British Industry and the Institute of Directors and members of the Cabinet, wants to join the EMS. The exception is the Prime Minister, who is preventing the country from doing so. To say the least, that is an interesting constitutional position. It seems that the Prime Minister alone can prevent our national interests being pursued in Europe. We are being given no explanation of why this should be so. Instead, we were told yesterday that our joining the EMS will happen after the next general election. We know now that the election is a long way away. Why do we have to wait before joining the EMS?

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that we must not use the EMS as a bolthole. I am not suggesting that we should. The fact is that sterling is 1·42 to the dollar, and much lower than it was against the mark. We should be able to hold this position provided that we are not subject to speculation. If we are, and we are a member of the EMS, we shall be supported. The speculators would know that and would not try it. That has always been the lesson of support.

Mr. Neilist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: No, I will not. I am sorry.

The Prime Minister is reported as saying in an interview, a report of which appears in today's edition of the Financial Times, that everyone knows that the market is 95 per cent. speculation and only 5 per cent. trade. What an astonishing admission for someone who believes that the market is the solution to all our problems. If the market is as my right hon. Friend suggests, there is a situation which cannot continue.

The market is tied up with another factor which is basic to our future, which is whether we take a short-term or long-term view. We are taking a shorter and shorter view —so they are in the United States—of the economy, industry, monetary affairs and all aspects of economic life. It is now no longer than a three-month view. If a firm's three months' results are not good, it is thought that the answer is, "Away with the management. Change the management and change everything else and see what the three months' results are like then." That is the explanation of what is going on in the United States, where there has been an incredible number of management changes, mergers and amalgamations. This is quite apart from the "benefits" of insider dealing.

A short-term view is being taken, and this is one of the disadvantages of the British banking system. I hear about this in my constituency. I hear it from business men who have projects and are unable to get anyone to support them. They are asked what they will produce in the first three months and, of course, they cannot answer that question. In the Japanese economy there is a 10-year lead time on many projects that involve up-to-date technology. The Japanese take a long-term view. Japanese bankers take a long-term view because that is the view that is taken by their Government, and because all parties work together. That is consensus.

Until the Treasury takes a long-term view of the economy and imposes it by example on the rest of the financial community, we shall not be able to solve our industrial problems. That applies also to the Government's interest in nationalised concerns. A longer-term view must be taken. It must be recognised that we cannot turn over a firm or industry overnight. Time is necessary, especially where capital investment has been lacking for so long. How right we were to fight General Motors' proposed takeover of Austin-Rover. We were absolutely right to do so, and that has been proved to the hilt. General Motors put no investment into its plants in the south and it is now closing seven plants across the United States simultaneously. It wanted to take over Austin-Rover and Leyland Trucks so that it could use their products if they were found to be better. If it had not come to that view, it would have closed the whole lot down. That shows that we were right to prevent the takeover of British firms by a great American concern.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North) rose——

Mr. Heath: As America gets into more and more difficulties with its economy, so we shall see more of its great firms following the course of General Motors.

Mr. John Carlisle: I remind my right hon. Friend that General Motors has made substantial investment in and around my constituency. The week after next, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry is opening a new paint plant, which represents an investment of about £80 million over the past 12 months. I think that my right hon. Friend's remarks about General Motors and his attitude to GM and the BL merger is most unfair, and has resulted in the loss of about 1,400 jobs in and around the Luton area.

Mr. Heath: I was talking about investment in trucks. If I am wrong, I shall withdraw, but it was said at the time —this has never been denied—that heavy investment to produce new truck models would not take place. In this context I am talking about Luton and Bedford. We were told that investment was one of the reasons why we should allow the takeover to take place. It is said that General Motors would look after the two systems together.

In dealing with the future of industry and Europe, I wish to deal with support for technology. It was stated that the aim of the Milan summit was "to strengthen the scientific and technological base of European industry and encourage it to be more competitive at international level."

That is a firm undertaking by our Prime Minister. We are now in the chair in Europe, and what are we doing? We are trying to prevent the Community spending more on the next five-year programme than it spent on the previous one instead of trying to allow the Community to make further progress. We are seeking to limit what it shall do. It seems that we are dealing only with words. We put words into a communiqué, but when it comes to practice and to implementing them, we do not support those words. That is why Europe is falling further and further behind the Pacific.

European countries are not operating together. There is enormous duplication in all technology in European firms. During our presidency we should have taken the lead in ensuring that resources are made available, but we have not done so. The final meeting is still to come, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will change his position and that of our representative and allow the necessary resources to be made available. If that is not done, we shall never make progress in Europe.

We are more than two thirds of the way through our presidency and what have we achieved. The answer is nothing. Can anyone point to anything in the economic sphere where we have achieved anything? The answer is nothing. Not one single thing has been achieved.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Heath: We have said that we want improvement and that we want a completely free market by 1992. We have said also that we want to compete with the rest of the world, but we are doing nothing about it. How can we expect the rest of the Community to co-operate with us when we give no lead and when we do not join the EMS? It is not human to expect them to co-operate with us. Those are the great issues.

Finally, I wish to mention arms talks and expenditure on arms. As I have said, neither east nor west can afford the present expenditure. Therefore, there must be a drive to reduce armaments. Every time I hear the phrase, "with proper supervision", I know that nothing will happen. It is inevitably the excuse for not reaching agreement. We had all this back in 1960, 1961 and 1962. Mr. Macmillan, as he then was, took risks on supervision and coverage. One will always take a risk on that, but the risk is worth taking, provided that it can be defined, as we could then. The risk of not knowing that atom bomb testing is going on has been removed by modern technology.

It is essential that the summit gets down to the business of arms reductions. However, I have never accepted the zero-zero formula because it exposes us entirely to nuclear weapons on the eastern side and, what is more, will require even greater expenditure on conventional forces in any attempt to try to equal the east. That is where the argument of Labour Members collapses, because the extent of the expenditure required in those circumstances would be enormous. But we cannot accept the position as it is after Reykjavik.

On Iran, we as a nation and a Government must say frankly that this was a very discreditable operation. There is no point in saying all the time that the President was right in doing this and right in doing that. In fact, it was hypocrisy to tell the rest of us to counter terrorism and not to make arrangements with terrorists in any circumstances when, for the past 18 months, the President has been doing that in Iran. It is said that it was done to help the moderates in Iran — where are they? There are no moderates in Iran. If one wishes to help them, one helps them in other ways in Paris, preferably not with tanks or weapons. That was a completely bogus story and it is unjustifiable for the Government to connive at it or accept that it has any validity. If we are to maintain credibility among our colleagues in Europe, above all, and elsewhere, it is much better for us to acknowledge the real position.

Therefore, I hope that we can get down to the basic business of controlling and reducing armaments and reducing the burden of expenditure. The strategic defence initiative is not justified. It means enormous expenditure and, comparatively, we are getting very few contracts out of it. It is completely unrealistic to say that it will go up only to the feasibility stage, as that takes no account of the power of the military in the United States. We have seen their operations before. They get their own way. Once the feasibility stage is reached, who can stop them from saying, "Now we shall put it into operation. Break the anti-ballistic missile agreement and put this into operation."? That is unlikely to happen because, after this Administration, the entire thing will be abandoned. But we must be aware of the problems of SDI and how it affects Europe. It would unbalance the entire question of deterrence. If it was fully implemented, it would leave Europe entirely under the spell of the Soviet Union. Both those effects would be absolutely undesirable.

I hope that, in this economic debate, the Chancellor will take account of those world forces which are not acting altogether to our advantage — the playback in developing countries, the United States going protectionist and the supreme rise in the Pacific basin countries of Japan, South Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan. That is where the life is today. They are looking to the future, and they know it. They say that Europe has a great civilisation and has contributed much of its time to culture, art and music. But that is the past. They are not interested in our past, they are interested in their future. We must create in our young people the spirit of the future. That means that we must give them hope and opportunity and show them how we will deal with those immense problems, especially the problem of unemployment.

6.4 pm

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): It would be embarrassing for the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) if I said that Labour Members agreed with much of what he said, were it not for the fact that, on this occasion, the right hon. Gentleman's remarks also found an answering echo among many Conservative Back-Bench Members who, by their attention, silence and failure to heckle him — as they have done in the past — seemed to show some acquiescence with his remarks. There is a growing apprehension among Conservative Members that much of what the right hon. Gentleman said has a serious stratum of truth.

This afternoon, as always, we listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with great respect. He is a clever man. We know it, and he knows it. He knows what he is doing. But, listening to his speech this afternoon — admittedly before the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) brought the news from Aix to Ghent or from the tape to the Chamber — I thought that he should have left that sort of speech to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who does it so much better. Even with the beetle-browed cynicism which the right hon. Gentleman assumes, he cannot emulate the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the exaggeration and stupidity with which he talks. I beg the right hon. Gentleman to act as a Chancellor of the Exchequer, not as he did this afternoon.

In recent weeks, the right hon. Gentleman has failed to act as a Chancellor. He has been swept aside by electoral considerations. Of course, I am in favour of what he has done to increase public expenditure, but it is at least cynical to say that what he has done now could and should have been done much earlier and is now being done purely for electoral reasons. It reminded me of an old friend who had made some money and whose motto was, "Live rich, die poor." He said that the trouble is that his wife wakes him up in the middle of the night, digs him in the ribs and says, "Are you sure you have got your timing right?" When the right hon. Gentleman heard the news brought by the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding, he must have been apprehensive and wondered whether he had got his timing right for the next election.

I must not be too harsh, because the right hon. Gentleman has recently been paying me handsome compliments, although he does not avow them. For some time, he has been saying that inflation is at its lowest for 20 years. He is quite right. Under a Labour Government, it was 2·6 per cent., and I remind the House that I was Chancellor of the Exchequer then. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will continue to repeat that, but he might add another relevant statistic when discussing those matters. I promise that I shall not weary the House with all the statistics that have been bandied about this afternoon. When the Labour Government left office in 1979, the rate of inflation was lower than when Labour took over from the Conservative Government in 1974. I congratulate the Chancellor on reducing inflation even further—some of the things the Government have done are good—but their achievements do not match up to the magnitude of their task or, indeed, of their promises.

Nevertheless, it is true that the right hon. Gentleman has had the good advantage and good luck—he is right to say that Chancellor should have some good luck—of a fall in the cost of raw materials and produce during the past 12 months. That is a once-for-all gain; he will not get it again. As he knows, those prices are beginning to increase. Nevertheless, inflation is down and we must try to keep it down to the present level. I support the Chancellor in that, and I am glad that he has managed to achieve it. But I hope that he will recall that he was not alone in reducing inflation. The Labour Government did their share, too.

As the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said, for the Chancellor history seems to start in 1982. Nothing that happened before 1982 has any special relevance. It reminds me of the photographs published from time to time in the Soviet press in which the figures of Mr. Trotsky or Mr. Molotov or whoever it may be has been painted out. We shall find that in future photographs of the Conservative Cabinet the miserable figure of the Foreign Secretary when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer will have disappeared, because he will have been blotted out of all the calculations.

We intend to go on reminding the Chancellor that the history of the Governnent started in 1979 and not in 1982. He should be a little more accurate in using some of his selective statistics. For example, the economic progress report is prepared not only with his authority but, I am told, under his hand. It would be a little more accurate and fair if the statistics in that started at 1979 rather than 1982. As he knows, all the figures on the back of that document and all the tables of the day start at 1982. The Government want to blot out the memory of the earlier years. I do not blame them, but the Chancellor should not be astonished when we remind him that the Government's term of office started in 1979.

I agree with the burden of the speech by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. The Chancellor spoke about manufacturing output declining under a Labour Government. Yes, it did decline, but does he not remember that he was elected to reverse that trend? Instead manufacturing industry has continued to decline, and today we have a smaller manufacturing base than we had when the Labour Government left office. The indictment of the Government is not that they have had only minor successes, or in the case of inflation a substantial success and in productivity a good success. Measured against the magnitude of the task that had to be done—this applies to every hon. Member in the House—the Government have failed, and no one, if he is honest, can pretend otherwise. We have failed as a nation, and Government policies have failed to reverse the long decline in British productivity, standards and capacity, and in our position relative to the rest of the world. Does the Chancellor deny that?

Only recently we were told that Italy has surpassed us in GNP per head. The steady decline that we have seen for years will continue. Perhaps it will be put off now, but I assume that over the next 12 months we shall see a large exchange of statistics and comparisons. They will not remove the fatal situation in which the Government exist. For the sake of the country, and whether or not it affects their electoral chances, the Government must admit that. The country and the Government have not reversed the decline that they were elected to reverse and which they said they could reverse.

This is almost certainly the last debate on the reply in which I shall have the honour to address the House. That decline is a problem that the Chancellor in his electoral address today failed to meet and discuss, yet it is the only problem that matters. I shall cut short what I have to say because I should have liked to say much of what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said about unemployment and about other matters. Whichever party wins power, what problems will it face? There will be the one which has been spoken about many times, the unacceptable level of unemployment. Whether the Conservative party wins or loses the election on unemployment, it is intolerable that a civilised society should allow 3 million people to be out of work for year after year. We should make the necessary changes to reduce the level of unemployment.

The difference between my party and the Government party is that the Government seem to assume that things can go on at that level. My party seems to be putting forward some remedies. Some of them will work, but I daresay that others of them will fail—that is the habit and fate of all Governments. However, I would sooner vote for a party that will try to make an effort to reduce the level of unemployment by implementing drastic and immediate plans than for a party that allows unemployment to continue on the basis of the complacency expressed by Conservative Members.

Unemployment is the first problem that the next Government will face. The second problem is that there will be a decline in oil output with all that that entails. Thirdly, as the Chancellor knows, there will be a serious deficit on our financial accounts with overseas countries. We shall be making a loss and he knows that that cannot continue and that the next Government, from whichever side it comes, will have to handle that situation. Fourthly, the new Government will start out with the knowledge that our manufacturing industry has a smaller base than when this Government came to power seven years ago. Fifthly, inflation will be increasing. That is not much of an inheritance from a Conservative Government of seven years who when elected said they would reverse all the tendencies of the previous years.

We are losing ground against the rest of the world. I have not been here for the whole of this debate, but I have read the speeches. They were interesting and yesterday's debate was interesting. What struck me was the thread from all parts of the House expressed in different ways and with a threefold basis. First, there was the plea: what do we do about certain long-established industries that are in difficulties or seem likely to be in difficulties? Secondly, several comparisons with Japan were made yesterday by hon. Members and some were made today by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. Thirdly, there has been a call for more training and for higher standards of management.

Those are certainly the three main topics that I take from the debate over the last five or six days and I should like to speak about each. Undoubtedly, we are living in a period of great industrial change. Some people talk about some of our older established industries almost with contempt, calling them the smokestack industries. The smokestacks may go, but there is great value in maintaining some of those industries, because they are what I call the core industries.

Many companies are divesting themselves of things which cannot make a profit and asking themselves what is the core of their industry and what must be kept. There are certain industries that we must maintain, and because no one measure applies to them all, we must take different measures to ensure their maintenance. I should like to see the Government carry out a study and create a coherent list of basic industries which they believe should be encouraged and protected—with a small "p"—in one way or another to enable them to survive.

One such industry is shipping, but I shall not go over the arguments that I have advanced so many times in the House about the vital importance of shipping and shipbuilding. The others are coal and other energy resources. I could take the House through a debate about the development of Margam in south Wales. That is a coal industry development that is being prevented. Why is that being prevented, because it is admitted by British Coal that there is a good case for developing the coal industry in Margam? It is held up because coal is priced in dollars and because of that and the exchange value, British Coal cannot make a short-term profit from the development of Margam. That is the kind of wrong approach about which the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup spoke and which we cannot afford.

There are other industries for which measures are required, such as the railways, aircraft and agriculture. We are entering a new industrial era and it would be sensible for the Government to select a certain number of industries which they intend shall remain. That is what some other countries do and nobody can claim that our record is so perfect that we can afford to ignore that.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): The right hon. Gentleman is making a strong and positive speech about energy resources. Will he give us his view about the future of the nuclear industry?

Mr. Callaghan: I think the hon. Gentleman wants to get me into trouble with my party. I do not want to follow the line that he has suggested. All energy sources must be developed, but I was speaking especially about the coal industry. At the moment our industrial structure is like a pyramid with a small group of managers at the top, a broader band of engineers at the centre and a large number of production workers at the base. That is not the industry of the future. In most of the advanced industries and companies in Japan, the pyramid is becoming more diamond-shaped. There is the same small group of managers at the top but there is a much broader band of engineers in the middle. That then tapers off, with even fewer production workers.

If we attempted to follow that course, it would have profound social consequences. The Japanese will undoubtedly capture even more markets. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) said yesterday that Japan is training four times as many engineers per head of population as Britain is today. In some Japanese factories—admittedly, in only a handful—I understand that today there are three times as many engineers as production workers, and it will have profound social consequences.

That is a source of very great pessimism, but it could also be a source of a very great hope. The new Japanese system of flexible, automated mechanism means that, instead of having to choose large-scale mass production, short runs are possible which enable customer demand to be met very much more easily than in Britain. This country is not very good at mass production but we are good at stimulating — and the Government have helped to stimulate it — small manufacturing production. That provides a message of hope for this country, provided that we can adapt quickly enough and copy what is being done in Japan. We should not be too proud to take lessons from Japan. It has found the secret of success. If new industrial developments enable us to provide satisfaction for individual customers, the prospects for this country will be very much better than they have been until now.

The training of managers, and consequently their competence and knowledge, is not sufficiently high. Reference has been made to the number of graduates who are working in industry, compared with the United States. We are not doing sufficient to attract graduates into industry. Although the Government say that they are handling this problem, their efforts are not commensurate with the size of the problem. The Government are doing a little, but they are not tackling the problem sufficiently fast. Furthermore, our technically literate work force is insufficient for our needs.

I agree about the need for Britain to associate itself more closely with European developments. I have two proposals to make, which hon. Members may think represent one step forward and one step back. I shall sum them up in a sentence; it is not often that a good policy can be summed up in one sentence. We should repatriate the common agricultural policy and join the European monetary system. The CAP has become a hindrance to European development, and it is high time that it went. I am told that it would be difficult to unravel, in which case we ought to set ourselves a target. We should say that the CAP must be unravelled within the space of, say, four years, that we should reduce by 25 per cent. a year the amount that is spent on the CAP by each country and that the 25 per cent. reduction must be made up, if at all, by individual national Governments, as they think fit, to meet their agricultural requirements.

It was ridiculous that two months ago when lambs were sent to market they should have drawn £20 each from the market when they were sold and £14 in subsidy. Nobody can defend such a system. The only alternative is to repatriate the CAP, despite all the difficulties that are involved, and to provide national Governments with the responsibility, because so much that is connected with agriculture has a social and strategic impact. Initially, this great amorphous mass seemed to be the only common bond that united Europe, but the European Community has grown beyond that point now. It could afford to get rid of this weakness that is dragging it back and to move ahead in other directions.

Some reasons have already been advanced for joining the European monetary system. I was not always in favour of joining it. There was a time when I thought—and it is still possibly true—that the value of sterling was too high. Now it is near to the point at which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could join the EMS without too many qualms. Ten days ago the Chancellor told us on television that in order to maintain the value of sterling he would increase interest rates. He has not done so yet. On that day, the value of sterling against the deutschmark was 2·94. Now it is down to 2·87 or 2·86. Sterling is very near to the point at which I would not use interest rates to prop up sterling. Sterling should be allowed to fall to about 2·80. I do not expect the Chancellor to comment on that suggestion. However, at that rate he could join the EMS without any of the ill effects that have been talked about. Even the Prime Minister might see some advantage in that, if it meant that interest rates did not rise.

The case for the EMS is that it would provide greater stability for industry and for those who are responsible for taking decisions. There cannot be a high level of investment if there is such a rapid rise and fall in the rates against which sterling has to compete. I am a great believer in greater exchange rate stability, and my long-term hope is that in some way the EMS will be expanded so as to embrace a loose relationship with the dollar and the yen. That would benefit both the industrialised and the developing areas of the world.

If I were asked to choose between action and inaction, I should choose action. We cannot allow the present complacency to continue. It is tempting to describe this country as falling over an abyss or steering onto the rocks. It is not doing either. However, a continuation of the present policies would result in a slow, inexorable continuation of the decline that we have witnessed over so many years. The present policies have failed to remedy that decline and I see no prospect of their doing so in future.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): It is a real pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). They are both ex-Prime Ministers. I have been in the House for a number of years but for not nearly so long as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. I draw one lesson from their speeches: that political parties should be very chary about making unemployment forecasts or about giving advice on how to spur on manufacturing success. All political parties have been unable since the war to reverse the decline in manufacturing industry, and I share many of the sentiments that have been expressed by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth.

The ability of any Government, on account of the rapid shifts in economic circumstances and the rapidity with which messages can be transferred from one market to another, to influence events is much less than it used to be some years ago. I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer shares my distaste for all economic forecasts. He is quite right to do so. I wish him luck with his forecast for this year—it all looks rather good.

It is unfair of both my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth to refer always to unemployment in the absolute number of figures without recognising the extraordinary social changes that have taken place over the past 10 years, and continue to take place. I refer to the rapidly growing number of people at work, a figure which has been rising since the middle of 1983. Not to take into account the rapid growth in the number of school leavers and the great social change that has come about by the number of women who are anxious to work is not to do justice to a rapidly changing situation.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth was right to draw attention, as have other speakers, to the particular concern of high unemployment in the regions, because while it is true that the number of people in work has continued to rise, the problem of the regions continues to grow because this is where our declining industries are based and there is not so much capacity for women to take men's jobs.

Whether or not the forecasts made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor are correct, it is important to assess the balance between expenditure and revenue and check whether present policies are likely to prove effective at home and carry confidence abroad. Given our open market system, it is impossible to ignore overseas opinion without making our position very much worse. One cannot dictate to other countries and other lenders the terms upon which they should lend one money, and it is a mistake that Socialist Governments throughout the world have always made. Not least, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth would admit that this is the case.

Nor can any Government be surprised at the care, one might almost say religious fervour, with which bankers regard such apparently esoteric matters as the PSBR and the money supply. They do so not because they are perverse and doctrinaire but because it is their customers' money that they are lending, which they do not wish to lose. They have a wide choice. Why, then, with all the achievements that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor can rightly claim, are interest rates so obstinately high? Our real rate of interest, allowing for the rate of inflation, is higher than that in any other industrial country.

It is true that our inflation rate is low, but it has to be said that it is even lower in other countries. What matters —it is on this that market forecasters differ somewhat— is whether it will remain low. There is no question but that interest rates would be substantially lower if there were real confidence that inflation was permanently under control, and if it were not for the threat of a Labour Government. This adds considerable strain on both the level of interest rates and the uncertainty that exists in markets. It is impossible to ignore that. This is not the sort of test that has to be applied in West Germany, where all are agreed that the market system must be adopted. In our country, the choice is still between a form of Socialism and a market economy. This possibility of a Labour Government is very expensive in terms of interest rates and future forecasts of what that rate of inflation might mean.

I have to confess that I felt greater confidence in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's unreconstructed monetary stage, when he used to trumpet the virtues of M3. He did so in his capacity as Financial Secretary, but he has been rightly regarded as the author of that policy. I preferred him in that role to his new revisionist phase, preaching the virtues of M0. M0 may be a good measure of something or other but whatever the faults in M3—I accept there are some—it gives a pretty good indication of the level of demand in the economy.

I can give a statistic. The level of new hire purchase credit—which has been extended as recently as 1981— was £7·8 billion. In 1985, it was £13·5 billion and in the first six months of this year, that figure was 50 per cent. up. The same is true of bank lending. The quantity of bank lending for the first six months of this year almost equals the whole amount of 1985. There cannot be any question that there is a consumer boom in progress, and what else can one expect of the plastic card revolution and the open competition between banks, building societies and every form of financial institution?

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor says that we have only to look at the ratio of debt to GNP to recognise that our rate is not as high as that in the United States, and I have no doubt that that is true. However, what really matters is the pace of advance of the increase in that debt, the strain that it in turn places on our resources at home, and the pressure that it brings to bear. It is bound to lead to capacity constraints at home and a continuing bonanza for our overseas suppliers, as well as, as we have seen and recognised, a considerable demand for higher wages, which has so far been met.

It is impracticable to return to hire purchase control. I remember when the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth was Chancellor, and had that weapon at his disposal. There was a thing called the regulator, which he could put up and down with purchase tax. We do not have that now and we rely entirely on the markets and the interest rate.

Perhaps we should never have abandoned the monetary policy—I do not think that we should have done so. West Germany controls its monetary policy by controlling its central bank money stock and so keen is it to do so that it has announced a reduction in public expenditure and an increase in interest rates, although those rates are still low.

Everything in our economy depends on interest rates, and they are high. Although the PSBR is not high, the contingency fund looks to me to be on the low side. I do not think that there is much margin for error. Considering the uncertainty that the prospect of the election must bring, far too much weight is borne by interest rates in our economy. One way in which this could be eased is by our joining the EMS. I was originally sceptical about our joining the EMS because I could not see any distinct advantages, at least not as long as we were pursuing a proper monetary policy. Now, it appears to me that the arguments are in favour of our joining.

Despite what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said, it seems that the choice between higher interest rates and a lower pound is illusory because, with a lower pound, and sterling sinking more, there is no alternative policy to pursue. The advantage of joining the EMS is that we shall be more closely tied to the deutschmark, and Germany follows a proper monetary policy. It would be likely to have a greater congruence with interest rates. In Germany, three-month money is at a rate of 4·7 per cent., in France at 7·5 per cent., while we have the highest short-term interest rate in Western Europe save Italy. I never thought I would see the day when the yield on Government long-dated bonds was lower in Italy than in our country.

Another reason is the instability caused by the United States deficit, which is fed by Japanese savings. Sterling should not be left awash in the tides of currencies that are flowing between Japan and the United States and which keep us in a rather isolationist position. The currency movements and speculation should not be borne by our country outside the EMS. We should enter the EMS.

There is no shortage of demand in our economy nor within western Europe as a whole, but there is evidence that the supply side is far too rigid. We have a long way to go further to break down the barriers in Britain, for these include barriers caused by what I conceive to be a vertically organised public expenditure array. Each Ministry looks at its own programme and there is scarcely any overall review of the total spending by Departments or any assessment as to whether money could be spent better in other directions. Nor, despite the marked improvements in our tax system, has there been any fundamental reform of the tax system as there has been in the United States.

In 1961, 21·5 million people were not liable to pay the standard rate of tax. Now only 10·7 million people are not so liable. Yet the number receiving housing benefit increased to 6·7 million last year compared with 2·9 million receiving rate rebates 10 years ago. The same people who are receiving housing benefit are paying the standard rate of tax at 29 per cent.

We need a lateral look at public expenditure, together with a thorough reform and simplification of our personal tax system. We need a substantial reduction in personal taxation, but only as part of a fundamental reform, carefully worked out and explained to the people much as it was in the United States. We may see a revenue windfall in North sea oil, for example, but without fundamental tax reform the combination of high real interest rates with low taxes is not one which it is easy or right to accept. That goes right outside any discussion whether there should be more public spending or lower taxes. There may be a good case for lower income tax in the Budget, providing the revenue is unexpectedly buoyant, but it is perverse to reduce revenue and increase interest rates at the same time.

More to the point, how would it look in those areas where unemployment is high and a large proportion of jobs are lost, perhaps for ever, to see the engines of the consumer boom still further charged, leaving them completely untouched? It is right to emphasise the increasing number of people at work, but we must also recognise the new social and industrial revolution which has taken place, the benefits of which are obvious in the south but which hardly exist in the north.

I do not believe that there is not more that we can do to assist industry and business in the north, especially by renewing the inner cities and by removing employers' national insurance contributions in those areas altogether. There may be other better ways, but it is certainly not against the tenets of the Tory party to act in that way and it never has been.

I remind the House of a speech made many years ago by a former Tory Prime Minister, Sir Robert Peel, when he had the nerve to increase income tax. In 1842 he said:

> "You may bear in mind that this is no casual and occasional dificulty. You will bear in mind that there are indications amongst all the upper classes of society of increased comfort and enjoyment, of increased prosperity and wealth, and that concurrently with these indications there exists a mighty evil which has been growing up for the last seven years, and which you are now called upon to meet. If you have, as I believe you have, the fortitude and constancy of which you have been set the example, you will not consent with folded arms to view the annual growth of this mighty evil. You will not reconcile it to your consciences to hope for relief from diminished taxation."

No, Sir and I do not think that we should either, in the face of the difficulties, and yet opportunities which we may seize if we will. I fancy that national unity, which we may gain by helping those who need it most, is the greatest prize of all.

6.43 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Millions of people, men and women, youth and unemployed, are looking forward to a Labour Government to deal with the enormous social consequences and problems, which the Government have exacerbated, of 4·5 million people unemployed, low wages, cuts in social services and pensions, and deteriorating housing and health services. Nothing in the Government's programme in the Queen's Speech will fundamentally alter the record of the past seven years of despair and insecurity that they have created.

Perhaps that despair is most graphically illustrated in a short item in Today in its coverage of the Knowsley by-election. It states:

"schoolkids aged ten wearily speaking of the pointlessness of taking exams just to increase the intellectual level of dole-queue chat."

That 10-year-olds can be driven to such despair is an indictment of the Government's seven years of office. Perhaps that point is made even more sharply by subway graffiti in my constituency which says:

"Vote Tory—retire at 16."

That is the image that many young people have of the Government's effectiveness.

It is interesting that we have heard little today and yesterday from Tory Members, with the possible exception of the more astute representatives of the bourgeoisie, such as the right hon. Members for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) and for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who at least recognise the organic crisis within the capitalist economic system. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister have shown a ludicrous economic optimism. They have stated that we are in the sixth successive year of successful economic growth and have spoken about the underlying strength of the British economy.

In reality, Britain is now a third-rate power, economically, politically and diplomatically. British manufacturing output was overtaken by Italy in the late 1970s and today it is on a par with Brazil. That analysis was made, not by some fanciful Socialist newspaper, but by the Midland bank, which can hardly be accused of Left-wing leanings.

The Government have about as much feeling for manufacturing industry as Lucrezia Borgia had for catering. This Tory economy, presided over by the Chancellor and his right hon. and hon. Friends, is heading for deep trouble. Next year both the balance of payments and the balance of trade will be in huge deficit. I hear talk that that will put severe pressure on sterling. Certainly, if there is any further fall in the value of the pound, prices will increase and pressure will be exerted for higher interest rates. It seems that next year we shall return to "stagflation" — a word invented by the financial newspapers in the 1970s — which means stagnant production, rising unemployment and rising inflation. Yet all we get from the Chancellor are fairyland economics and talk about the underlying strength of the British economy.

In the five years since the last world recession in 1981 British capitalism has not recovered the levels of manufacturing output of 1979. They are now 10 per cent. below the levels of 1973. There is probably less being produced in 1986 than during the three-day week in 1974. Unemployment is three times as high as in 1979 and employment in manufacturing industry has been cut by the loss of 2 million jobs.

What has that meant to Coventry? It has meant the complete disappearance of Alfred Herbert — apparently the largest, most effective manufacturer of machine tools in Europe—the disappearance of Triumph with its 8,000 jobs, drastic slimmingdown in Leyland, Alvis, Talbot, GEC and Rolls-Royce. Only the £41,000 million of oil revenue together with the huge trade and budget deficits of the United States of America have partially masked the condition of our national accounts during the past five years.

Those bubbles are bursting. The first one, the oil bubble, has already started to burst and the American economy, the second bubble, has not many months to go, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) recognised. At least he retains some elementary economic understanding, even if nowadays he tries to move away from his record of 1970-74 and to cloak his iron fist of those days with the velvet glove of his words today.

The only good news in the economy we are offered is that the rate of profits has risen and is the highest for the past 10 years. Setting aside the human misery caused by the mass unemployment that has largely made that possible, what is the function of profits in a capitalist economy? Profits are to be reinvested and used to modernise and re-equip factories and industry so that more goods can be produced more quickly and more cheaply.

A recent National Economic Development Office report was suppressed by the Chancellor, who has obviously been having words with the Tory party chairman on gagging. That report shows that manufacturing investment in 1985 was 17 per cent. lower than in 1979. It was even lower than in 1970.

According to the National Westminster bank — I cannot be accused of using partisan sources for my statistics—there is now a gap of the order of £200,000 million in the level of investment that British factories would need to catch up with Japan, Germany, France and America, yet this year only £5,000 million will go towards manufacturing investment. Even on a simply quid pro quo basis, that means a 40-year gap between the level of investment that is required and what is actually taking place.

According to the NEDO report, net investment to replace worn-out machinery has been negative since 1980, which roughly means that for every pound's worth of worn-out machinery, only 80p is put back. The only good news from the report is that last year net investment almost rose to zero, but even then was not quite sufficient to replace worn-out machinery.

Those are the real factors that have an influence on the decision of the Tories to go for an early election. That is the real reason why the Chancellor came forward last week with his autumn statement, with its apparent £10,000 million increase in public expenditure. Given the Government's record over the last seven years of cutting expenditure, giving back £10,000 million is akin to a mugger who steals an old lady's pension book and offers to give her the bus fare home. Yet we are expected to feel a sense of charity for that £10,000 million increase.

That pre-election spending, like this pre-election Queen's Speech, is totally inadequate to meet the social needs of working people. Over the past seven to 10 years, the rising Right of the Tory party has said that manufacturing does not matter, that we have a surplus in invisible earnings and that the City will save us. I happen to believe that the pimps and sharks of the City's square mile are not interested in anything but a fast buck—or 15,000 fast bucks in the case of Mr. Collier of Morgan Grenfell. The casino economy in the City will not be the saviour of British capitalism. It will be one of its pall bearers and one of the contributors to the heightening of the internal contradictions within the capitalist system.

Every day about $150,000 million change hands across the world exchanges. As actual daily world trade is worth only $7,000 million, that means that for every $1 that pays for goods, $20 change hands in currency deals and speculation that bear no relation to reality. These totally fictitious deals are conducted by brokers and jobbers who are the highest paid bookies' runners in the country. Some of them earn as much as £1 million a year—£500 an hour—for not producing anything that is useful. They are literally 20th century parasites living off the blood and sweat of working people who are the real wealth creators within the economy.

Tonight there is news that the Financial Times index fell by 18 points this afternoon, which has wiped £4,000 million off the value of the Stock Exchange. But that is not real wealth—it is the paper value of the companies belonging to the stock exchange, and it is high-class gambling.

Some hon. Members may say that the Stock Exchange raises money for investment, yet only 6 per cent. of its turnover has anything to do with industrial and commercial investment in this country. Earlier the Chancellor had the gall to say that workers overpay themselves, and called for the reductions in unit wage costs. That is rich coming from the right hon. Gentleman. He is on £1,000 a week and does not have to worry about whether he can afford to feed and clothe his family.

In fact, wages have been reduced. The West Midlands Engineering Employers Association reports that in the last 12 months, 46 per cent. of all wage deals in engineering were under 4 per cent. and that 80 per cent. were below 5 per cent. That has not stemmed the rising tide of industrial unemployment in that area. In Coventry alone, 4,500 engineering and manufacturing jobs have been lost during the same 12-month period.

The CBI says that there should be a zero increase in wages, but it does not apply the same rules and regulations to its own members. The 40 members of the president's council of the CBI awarded themselves an average 19 per cent. wage rise last year, and one of them had the gall to give himself a 207 per cent. wage rise. Yet they still ask workers to shoulder the burden of the crisis in the economic system. When I put that point to the Chancellor several hours ago, he did not even have the courtesy to try to answer it.

Why do Conservative Members continue to call for lower wages? Late last night one Conservative Member talked about consumers buying goods, but how can they if they have less and less money in their pockets? Wage cuts and mass unemployment may well help particular firms to undercut competition in a particular industrial sector, but when applied across the economy as a whole such action merely reduces the market. That is one reason why over-capacity has accelerated in recent years.

Another reason is that British capitalism cannot sell the goods that it makes because overseas competitors can produce the same goods more quickly and more cheaply. Factories in this country on average operate at 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. capacity, and in some sectors it is 50 per cent. or lower. Employers and industrialists openly ask why they should bother to invest when they cannot even sell the goods they make at present. Instead they pour their money overseas to the cheap labour economies of South Africa, Korea, Argentina and Brazil. Since the Government lifted exchange controls six or seven years ago, £100,000 million has left this country.

This Government do not care about manufacturing industry. They do not understand that it is the bedrock of wealth creation. Their only aim is profit, and they do not care whether or not it is fictitious, as it certainly is in relation to the casino economics of the stock exchange. This Cabinet represents finance capital. It has won the battle within the Tory party over members such as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup who represents manufacturing industry.

Before the Government came to power and throughout the period of their office—rapidly hastening since 1979—we have seen the withering of Britain's industrial base. Britain, which was once known as the "workshop of the world" is now laughingly called "the warehouse of the world", given that we are now experiencing rising import penetration in many major industrial and manufacturing sectors. The Government are responsible for turning a £3 billion surplus in manufactured trade in 1980 into a £6 billion deficit in 1985. For the first time since the days of Queen Elizabeth I, more factory-made goods are imported than are exported.

The consequence of that sea change which has led to the devastation of manufacturing industry has been partiularly noted in Coventry over the last 12 months. There have been massive redundancies in the engineering sector. GEC has lost more than 1,000 jobs, and jobs have also gone in Alvis and Self Changing Gears. We have seen the total collapse of Coventry Climax, and Bretts Stamping, and job losses at Massey Ferguson, Sterling Metals, and Talbot. The knock-on effect of all those redundancies means that in the last 12 months 4,500 jobs have been lost. I have mentioned only the engineering companies, and have said nothing about the service sector companies such as Storers, British Home Stores, Tesco and others, most of which are located in Coventry, South-East.

All we get from the Government is yet another fiddle in the dole statistics. The official Department of Employment dole figure for Coventry, South-East in September this year was 7,154 or 21·7 per cent. of the working population, but an analysis carried out by the Unemployment Unit, which included those who were not counted by the Government, showed the unemployment level to be 8,345 or 25·3 per cent. More than one in four people who wish to work are denied the right to do so.

Even based on the official rigged figures, unemployment in the four wards that I represent ranges from 15 per cent.—itself above the national average—to 39·5 per cent. The highest level of male unemployment in Coventry is in St. Michael's in Coventry, South-East, and stands at 44·7 per cent. If we add the over-60s and people on schemes, more than half of the men in that area are without a chance of work.

The official figures say that 7,500 people are unemployed in Coventry, South-East. That costs the Treasury £46 million a year in benefits, lost tax and lost national insurance contributions. That is equivalent to £36 a week for everybody who has a job in the constituency. Is that not insanity? We are paying people to stay at home and not produce goods that working people need.

[Mr. Dave Nellist]

We have more than 1,000 houses in Coventry which are unfit for human habitation and another 14,000 which need major repairs, modernisation or renovation and yet hundreds, if not thousands, of building workers are paid to stay at home and not repair, renovate or modernise those homes. That is a clear illustration of the archaic and anarchic capitalist economic system, especially under the present Tory Government.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that the statistics show that, on average, 25 per cent. of people involved in the building and construction trade are unemployed and have been for some time? Is he further aware that, in my borough, which is not too far from his, no council dwellings have been built since 1979, largely as a result of Government economic policy? Is he aware that, throughout the country, there are hundreds of thousands of people who desperately need accommodation who could not possibly afford a mortgage but who are denied accommodation because of the Government's housing policies?

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Throughout the country, some 6 million people are living in damp houses and 400,000 building workers are unemployed. London Brick is storing enough bricks behind its Bedford factory to build a town the size of Derby. Capitalism under the Tory Government says, "Keep those things separate." Socialism and planning say, "Bring them together so that the needs of working people can be met by people who have the skills and the materials." There is, however, no hope of that happening under the present Government.

What hope do we get in the Queen's Speech? One of the things on offer is privatisation of state assets which, we are told, will "improve economic efficiency". Privatisation is so much of a dogma for the Government and the Prime Minister that if General Galtieri had offered to buy the Falklands the Prime Minister would undoubtedly have sold them.

The Chancellor spoke earlier of extending democracy by share issues. I have a little equation for him to work out when he gets home tonight. In a general election, some 40 million people are on the electoral register and roughly 75 per cent. vote, so 30 million people cast a vote. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or I want to go out and vote in a general election, our votes are worth one in 30 million. If we want to cast our vote regarding how nationalised industries are run, our vote is worth one in 30 million. If you or I—I will not, and I doubt whether you will either, Mr. Deputy Speaker — bought the 100 minimum shares in British Gas, bearing in mind the fact that the Government will sell 4,025,000,000 of those shares, casting our vote in a general meeting of British Gas shareholders would be one vote in more than 40 million. In other words, we would have one third less influence in British Gas after privatisation than in a general election.

Privatisation should be renamed what it really is — piratisation. It is legalised theft. It is stealing assets that are owned by people as a whole. They are being sold below their real value so that, in the main, the Government's rich friends can make a killing. Last week, I took part in a lobby of the House on conductive education, when £500,000 of Government money was being asked for to set up an assessment in Britain of a Hungarian system for teaching brain-damaged children to walk.

In Hungary, the system enables 70 per cent. of kids with Parkinson's disease, spina bifida or other forms of spinal or brain damage to walk and receive a normal state education. We were asking for £500,000 last week, but we have had stone-walling from the Department of Education and Science for the past year of asking. During that same year, the Departments responsible have spent £32 million on television, radio and press advertisements for British Gas alone. If the Financial Secretary to the Treasury sees Sid, he can tell him something from me. I have kids in Coventry who are more deserving of £500,000 of Government largesse than is Sid of the £32 million that has been spent so far on advertising his future.

The Government are so proud of their record on privatisation that they intend to extend it to local government, which was the subject of one day's debate. They also intend to extend it to the Post Office and industrial firms such as Rolls-Royce and Unipart. I warn the Government that, on 26 November, the enormous resentment of Rolls-Royce workers and their families at that action will be felt in a lobby. That company failed in 197! and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup nationalised it in 24 hours of parliamentary time. There has been hundreds of millions of pounds of public investment, the benefits of which are now to go to the rich parasites on the stock exchange.

When privatisation goes wrong, do we hear the same Tory Members discussing the matter? Certainly not. We did not in the case of Coventry Climax, which was privatised by the Tories in 1981. Not one penny has been paid by the consortium headed by Sir Emmanuel Kaye. When the firm collapsed at the beginning of last month, the Government disclaimed all responsibility. Before privatisation in 1981, there were 3,000 jobs there; 80 per cent. of them have gone in the past five years. There is a haemorrhage of jobs and only 600 or so are left.

Plants have closed. Only the Coventry site is left. Did the Government monitor what was happening so that they could at least say, "Look. Privatisation is working."? No. They disclaimed all responsibility. Even now that the firm has collapsed we have asked the simple question in public at the Dispatch Box and in private in the Secretary of State's conference room: "Why have the Government not monitored privatised firms? Will they monitor privatisation in future?" "Not interested," was the right hon. Gentleman's reply, If the Government had monitored what was going on, they would have seen the asset-stripping that took place. They might well have wondered, as workers most certainly did, why all of the important drawings of the most successful Coventry Climax models suddenly disappeared two days before the receiver was called in and sent to Coventry Climax's most important competitor — Lansing Bagnall — and returned two or three days later. The workers now face uncertainty and the possibility of the company being split into three or being bought by a competitor to eliminate the competition.

The Government still refuse to consider any realistic solution. Indeed, the only realistic solution for Coventry Climax would have been for the Government to honour the debt that they owe the workers and their families. They said in 1981 that privatisation would work. It has been a conspicuous failure. As with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and Rolls-Royce in 1971, the Government should renationalise Coventry Climax, compensate the workers who lost their jobs and their families and restore manning levels to the 1981 level. When I raised this issue with the Secretary of State in his conference room on 17 October, all he had to say was that "there appears to be a political gulf between us on this question."

I sat through most of yesterday's debate and I have sat through all of today's. Among the Conservative Members who impressed me most was the right hon. Member for Henley. He was the only one who recognised, at column 481, that "the decline of Britain's industrial base is not measured in the lifetime of this Government or of the previous one. Britain's industrial base has been declining relatively for most of this century. If one considers the statistics that matter — the share of the world's manufactured trade which Britain enjoys — they show that relentlessly, regardless of which Government are in power and regardless of policies and economic regimes, there has been a persistent decline in our share of world trade in manufactures."—[Official Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 481.]

That is most certainly true.

In 1913, Britain had 30 per cent. of world trade. In 1950, it had 25 per cent. of world trade. In the 14 years of so-called economic boom from 1950 to 1964, it had 14·2 per cent. of world trade. In the next 20 years to 1984, it had 7·6 per cent. of world trade. That was the result of a lack of competitiveness due mainly to lack of investment in manufacturing. There was a failure to modernise and re-equip.

What has been done with the money instead? In 1979, £43 billion was invested overseas. Some £122 billion is now invested overseas. So what is the truth? Lord Kearton, in the Lords report on manufacturing industry, said:

"It is rather like hearing the broadcast on the death of King George V: 'British industry is moving peacefully towards its close'. There are flickers of life now and again, but by and large the slow relentless decline is going on."

What are the implications of comments such as that? The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham gave them last night when he said:

"The decline in oil production and the trends in trade in manufactures will ensure, by one route or another, that we enter a new era of economic decline possibly combined with renewed inflation . . . There will be a nasty crisis in the next Parliament and the opposition parties can count themselves lucky that not they but my right hon. Friends will be dealing with it. It will be a difficult and unpleasant task."—[Official Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 500.]

I have read one or two of the right hon. Gentleman's books, which have some funny passages in them, but I do not know what he thinks has been pleasant about the past seven years. He may think that the tasks facing whoever takes over will be unpleasant. I happen to have a bit of an idea of what the next five or 10 years will bring. This is why the Queen's Speech and the debate have been so unrealistic and so irrelevant to the real situation facing the British economy. In the next five or 10 years the right hon. Gentleman will see increasing protectionism in the world economy, and increasing trade wars as each state tries to export the surplus that it cannot sell on its domestic market, with everybody trying to protect their own domestic markets from invasion.

In Britain, having abandoned investment, abandoned re-investment in factories of the profits that have been made by working people, the employers and industrialists will be left with only further and further cuts in wages and conditions if they are to enhance their profit levels. To do that, they require, in the words of the chairman of the Tory party, the neutering of the trade union movement—the emasculation of the rights of working people to defend themselves against such attacks. That is why the Government have passed three anti-trade union laws in the past six years. That is why firms such as BTR have sacked 300 workers in Hangers, as has Tom Clarke the boss of Silentnight. It also accounts for the actions taken against the workers at Wapping and in the pits. I do not believe that massive unemployment and poverty can be resolved by the Chancellor's elastoplast policies for manufacturing industry, particularly given the enormous economic chasm that will open in the next 12 or 18 months. That will require a genuine and thorough transformation of society on Socialist lines. Central to that transformation will be putting the control of the economy into the hands of working people, not rich speculators, and for that, we shall need a Socialist Labour Government.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I repeat Mr. Speaker's appeal for brevity. Many right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak, and unless speeches are much shorter, some hon. Members will be disappointed.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): With due respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I do not think that Mr. Speaker made such an appeal. I may be wrong about that, but I naturally appreciate the point that you made.

The speculation that we have suffered lately about the likelihood of an early election was certainly fanned by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who led the debate for the Opposition. It was continued by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor himself, to some extent, contributed to it. If the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) thought that he fanned the speculation, I have to tell him that I do not think that he succeeded. It would be quite unnecessary and most unwise to hold an early election. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would take any such decision, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) confirmed. It is better to assume that this Parliament will continue into 1988. Meanwhile, we must get on with the work that needs to be done.

In recent months, the Government have taken some very welcome policy decisions. Their self-designed straitjacket of monetarism has been abandoned. The excessive rigidities of public expenditure have been eased. The need to spend more on some programmes has been recognised, and the Government's fiscal stance is now less deflationary. The description of these sensible changes is a matter of taste or vocabulary. The point is that they have happened and they represent a welcome change.

For a few years, education has been a source of worry to the nation. Now, a new initiative, for which some of us have been calling for some time, is being taken. Obviously, there is a long way to go and there are many problems, some of which were mentioned by the former Prime Ministers who spoke in this debate. A start has been made. That is what I welcome. It is the same story with health matters and, to some extent, with housing and criminal justice. The electorate has been anxious about them, and new initiatives are now in place.

I am one of those who would have liked to see the changes much earlier. In future, they will have to be taken much further than they have been already, but at least we have them now. Meanwhile, and throughout this Parliament, we have seen the continuing success of privatisation and the spread of ownership and capitalism, with all the benefits that they will bring to individuals. We have seen the curtailing of excessive union power and the reduction of inflation. In all these ways, and in other ways, the Government have vanquished many of the ogres of the 1970s. They have done what they were elected to do, and they certainly deserve the support of the nation. For the future, that support will depend quite heavily on how we address the problems that face our country today.

Those problems are formidable. Whatever view we take of the gloomiest forecasts referred to in the debate, or of the analysis by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South (Mr. Callaghan), some of those problems, such as how to reduce unemployment and improve industrial competitiveness, are familiar ones for which solutions have not been found. Other problems are newer and have yet to emerge fully. They include coping with technological change—which is, of course, a huge social change — and healing social divisions. I find Opposition Members remarkably devoid of constructive thought on these issues. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook made no positive contribution towards solving the problems.

If we strip away all the arguments about the past, stop debating whether monetarism has relieved or exacerbated our problems, and stand further from the trees to look at the wood, we might see more clearly how things stand. We see a startling contrast. On the one hand, there have been five years of economic growth and, recently, a return to growth in manufacturing industry, although it has still not reached previous levels. The majority of the population have seen their living standards rise year by year, and most people are better off than ever before. On the other hand, well over 3 million are out of work. Unemployment, although marginally down in recent months—which is obviously extremely welcome—is still high and could rise again. The number of long-term unemployed is huge, and their living standards have fallen. Many exist at barely subsistence levels. Large areas of the country have experienced no growth whatever during the recent recovery. Individual responses to this situation differ vastly. We all suffer from inflation, and everyone responds to it in the same way, but unemployment provokes an unequal response. If one is amongst the 3·25 million unemployed, the rosy part of the picture is a mirage. If one is not among that number, and especially if one lives in the south-east, there is nothing to complain about.

Looking objectively at unemployment, there are two comments to make on this overall situation. The first is that it is unacceptable, and the second is that it will not change easily or be made to change easily. Anyone who thinks that a major reduction in unemployment is just around the corner should pause to consider some of the facts. First, they should consider the regions. The regions in which unemployment is highest have not witnessed any recovery — rather the reverse. Manufacturing employment is still falling. The scope for employment in new service industries barely exists.

I have urged my right hon. Friends to take a much more regionally oriented approach to the future, and I do so again today. There will always be an imbalance between the regions. The circumstances and needs of each are different and need different treatment. The mismatch of resources between regions, especially between north and south, is huge, yet there is no policy in place to correct it. Cambridgeshire, my constituency, is at one end of the scale and is the fastest-growing county. There is, as there has been for many years, enormous pressure for development there. As a nation, we must take advantage of the opportunities and consider what the pressures imply.

The possibility of development in Cambridgeshire is part of our prosperity in the 21st century, but to take full advantage of it effectively, we must look at development for the whole of the East Anglian region. At present, each county—Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk—is looking at its development in isolation, but there needs to be regional context that fits into a national context. That is the sort of context which this Government completely resist. However, they are mistaken. If developing the possibilities for the future prosperity of the next generation matters, which it does, we must take full advantage of this.

At the other end of the scale, in areas such as Teesside or Liverpool, there are massive unused resources, and some of them will probably not be capable of use again. But many will be, especially the people. We need a regional approach that will start to bring those huge divergencies more into balance. I am here concerned with the mobility of labour, the price of property and the availability of housing. None of them is receiving adequate—or, as far as I know, any—attention at present. It will be a long process, and I want to see a start being made on it. It would certainly contribute to bringing hope to the declining regions.

The second fact to consider involves the implications of rising productivity. For example, British Steel now produces more steel than in 1979 with half the work force, and British Leyland now produces three times as many cars per employee as in 1979. Both of those examples show how deep-seated the British malaise has been. Such improvements in productivity are imperative for the future prosperity of the country. Without them, our industrial position will deteriorate. Yet those same improvements are bound to lead to job losses. There is no escaping that conclusion. Only growth can create job replacements.

We must face the fact that, at least in the short term, the very steps needed to make our economy stronger will at the same time make unemployment worse. My approach to that dichotomy is based on two convictions. First, if jobs have to be lost in order for the country to prosper, those who lose them have as much right to share in the resulting prosperity as those who continue to work. Their contribution has been just as great, and from some points of view, greater. Secondly, nobody will prosper if, in a desire to be fair, we end up confusing economic and social aims. The Labour party, for all its genuine concern about unemployment — it certainly is genuine — has consistently confused those two aims, and still does so.

The previous Labour Government introduced a national insurance surcharge when our competitiveness was already crippled by inflation. That was utterly unhelpful to our economy. The Labour party has fought almost every redundancy caused by improved efficiency or new technology, and now advocates a levy on turnover — or does it? — and a national minimum wage which would take no account of economic conditions or of companies' circumstances. Its motives are honourable, but the means chosen have been quite inappropriate.

The Labour party has pursued social objectives by methods that are detrimental to economic objectives. Increased employment and rising living standards cannot be achieved by adding to industrial costs, by rejecting new technology, or by prescribing low productivity. Consequently, we must recognise that the social and economic objectives are separate. They should be pursued separately, but equally. The principal economic objective is to assist the constant expansion of industry. The principle social objective, of course, is to ensure a free, united and harmonious nation. However, in this debate I shall not dwell on that.

On the economic side, the main requirements are the reduction of industrial costs, the control of inflation, an increase in long-term investment, especially in new technology, and a stable political environment. I put the reduction of costs first, because competitiveness is crucial. When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor considers his Budget, I hope that he will abolish altogether employers' national insurance contributions. He made a start last year. Those insurance contributions are a social tax on industry, and bear directly on industrial costs. My right hon. Friend has abolished the surcharge, which should never have been put in place, and exactly the same arguments apply to the basic contributions.

The most difficult area from the costs point of view involves incomes. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer constantly complains about excessive pay increases, which implies that he recognises the need for some form of effective incomes control. Incidentally, that was one of the functions that monetarism was supposed to perform, but, as we know, it has not done so. We also know that all previous incomes policies have been unsatisfactory. The absence of any policy — which is what we have today — is no better. The Government prefer no policy in that area, but that is not producing results. As a consequence, our competitiveness is deteriorating. Yet the Government are not addressing that problem.

We should be searching hard for solutions to the incomes problem, just as we are searching hard for solutions to the rates problem. They should be widely debated by the nation. We should also be seeking to reduce interest rates and to stabilise the international value of sterling. Its present level is somewhere near right, but the enormous fluctuations of recent years have damaged our overseas trade. There is no doubt about that. Some deals facing businesses have almost been a gamble because of the uncertainties over the exchange rate. Anything that damages our overseas trade must be tackled most vigorously.

The real need is for much better international co-ordination for the benefit of the world economy and world trade. I acknowledge, of course, that that is extremely difficult to achieve. However, our efforts should be unremitting and unrelenting. In so far as it would make a contribution—and I believe that it would—the case for joining the European monetary system is now overwhelming.

Once again, I urge my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to pursue the integration of social security benefits and tax. That is the way to end the poverty trap and to restore incentives to work. I do not know of any other way of doing that, other than integration and the basic incomes proposal. However, I shall not detain the House with that tonight. I am convinced that a major change is essential, and I should like to think that it will be a central feature of the next Parliament. In this area, I should say that the Government like to think that they are radical, but they are nothing like radical enough.

I shall conclude by mentioning two words that have acquired an absurd significance for the Government, consequently limiting their scope for action: intervention and consensus. The Government have given both those words definitions that reflect our worst experiences since the war, which nobody would want to see repeated. As a result of their definitions, they have set their faces against any or all intervention, and against the civilised process of trying to secure the widest possible measure of public consent for their actions. I do not want the Government to be intrusive or to interfere in business or with the market, let alone operate businesses. The Government are rightly getting rid of the businesses that they inherited in 1979 as quickly as possible. But I want them to take a positively supportive role, especially in relation to overseas trade.

The governments of other countries are closely involved with their industries, and often subsidise them. The world market is not a free market. Our Government must enable our producers and industries to compete on equal terms. There is an essential role for them which they are reluctant to play in case they are accused of intervention. What nonsense! If they had acted in that way, in a proper partnership with industry, we might, for example, have secured the £1 billion order from the Pentagon, which in the end went to France. So I hope that my right hon. Friends will cast aside their self-imposed prejudices — their own Humpty-Dumpty-like definition of these words, and think again about their role in support of industry.

As many hon. Members want to speak in the debate, I have simply outlined this afternoon a few of the ideas which I think should inform our approach to the challenges that we face in future. There are many others to which I should have liked to refer if there had been more time. In conclusion, I wish the Government every success in this enormous task and the enormous responsibilities that they face.

7.30 pm

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I wish to echo the call of the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) to the Chancellor for a regional approach to his economic management. However, before I do that, I cannot resist the observation that, in the debate so far, there has been little comfort for the Chancellor. Indeed, the impression has come across strongly in most of the speeches, that for all the Chancellor's repeated proclamations of his attachment to the medium-term financial strategy, he will still need a lot of luck in its fulfilment.

The Chancellor's forecast of 3 per cent. growth with inflation staying under 4 per cent. is similar to that of the London Business School. However, the LBS has pointed out that that outcome depends on a rapid response from manufacturing industry to the recent fall in the exchange rate. In his powerful speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) stressed how serious is the shrunken industrial base of our economy. Given what has happened to manufacturing over just the past six years—as my right hon. Friend explained—can British producers fairly be expected to cope? Manufacturing investment has risen fast in recent years in countries—again as we heard from my right hon. Friend and from the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—such as West Germany and Japan, but not in this country. That is reflected in the import-export balance of the economy. We note that the volume of exports of manufactures has been running recently at about 13 per cent. above the 1980 levels, whereas the volume of imports is no less than 51 per cent. higher.

The longer view of manufacturing reveals that output as a whole has recently been running at no more than 3 per cent. above the 1980 level. We find the reasons for that in the catastrophic change in all the great and traditionally important manufacturing areas of south Wales, the north of England and Scotland. I hope that the House will bear with me if I confine my attention to one of these traditionally important manufacturing centres—Sheffield and the county of south Yorkshire.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, I will make my assessment on the basis of what has happened during the past six years, during the tenure of this Government. That is where I would like to place the burden of my speech. It is necessary to remind the House that the British economy has experienced substantial change over the past two decades. In particular, 2·5 million manufacturing jobs have gone while there has been an increase of 2·25 million service jobs. The increase in the labour force over the same period has therefore meant a tenfold rise in unemployment levels.

Unemployment within Yorkshire and Humberside has risen faster than the national average in almost every sector. Indeed, right across the Yorkshire and Humberside region, growth prospects are bleak. In 1981 there were approximately 26,000 jobs in the Sheffield travel-to-work area. More than half now come from producer or consumer service industries. By contrast, the manufacturing and extraction industries—once the major source of employment in Sheffield—have declined to no more than one third of all jobs. Sheffield's decline in manufacturing employment has so far outstripped the decline in manufacturing employment nationally. Sheffield lost more jobs in the 1970s than the rest of Britain. The unemployment rate in Sheffield overtook the national rate in 1981 and since 1982, unemployment rates in Sheffield have continued to remain well above the national rate.

Over the past two years, many companies in Sheffield have reported improved turnover and profit and, to some extent, have recovered from the recession. Many have recently invested in new plant and equipment but very few have significantly increased employment levels. By contrast, there has been the major closure of the British Steel Corporation Tinsley Park works in my constituency just a year ago with the loss of 1,100 jobs. There has been a massive rationalisation at Sheffield Forgemasters next door to my constituency with the loss of 1,000 jobs over the past two years. These losses have overshadowed the improved performance of some of the smaller companies.

Nationally, very few manufacturing sectors have shown employment growth in recent years. The most notable has been electronics. More generally there have been significant developments in the technology industries. Set against these however, must be such forecasts as that produced by the university of Warwick institute for employment research, which predicts a fall in manufacturing employment of 400,000 over the next five years.

Sheffield's east end remains an important location in manufacturing employment, but the future of many jobs in the lower Don valley is tied into the decisons of industries using domestic products such as motor vehicles and power generation. Government policy and, in particular, public expenditure decisions are crucial. It is apparent that the resources required for any meaningful development of the Don valley are beyond the capacity of Sheffield city council or any of the neighbouring authorities such as Barnsley, Doncaster or Rotherham. That is why these local authorities are coming together in an integrated operations programme which is focused on the county of south Yorkshire, which is still one of Britain's most important industrial areas. More than 1·25 million people live in the county, largely in the urban centres of Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham, Sheffield and the Dearne towns around Mexborough. South Yorkshire as a whole, and not merely Sheffield, has been especially hard-hit by the recession due to its dependence on such industrial sectors as coal, steel and heavy engineering. As recently as 1981, mining accounted for 53,400 jobs or 10·6 per cent. of employment in south Yorkshire; metal manufacture and metal goods accounted for 67,600 jobs or 13·4 per cent. of employment and engineering, and vehicles for 37,200 jobs or 7·5 per cent. of employment. Widespread plant closures and other rationalisation measures under this Government have led to dramatic and continuing rises in unemployment. Many of the larger companies are now on a firmer financial footing and are showing signs of recovery but this has had no impact on the overall level of unemployment.

Unemployment problems have been compounded by the increased levels of coalmining closures and redundancies over the past 18 months. As a matter of fact, the decline of the coal, steel and engineering industries has caused major unemployment problems in south Yorkshire. In July this year, 107,310 persons were registered for unemployment benefit at an unemployment rate of 19 per cent. That compared with a regional rate of 13·8 per cent. and a United Kingdom rate of 11·9 per cent. That entirely bears out what the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said in his regional comparisons.

Before the decline of metal manufacturing, metal goods and engineering sectors in the early 1980s, unemployment in Sheffield was below the national average. The subsequent sharp increase in unemployment has pushed the unemployment rate well above the national and regional averages and by July this year 16·9 per cent. of the work force, or 48,423 people, were unemployed.

For many people in south Yorkshire unemployment is no longer a short-term experience. In July this year 45,684 or 42·6 per cent. of those unemployed had been out of work for more than a year. Even more worrying, 29,154 or 27·2 per cent. of those unemployed in the country had been out of work for more than two years. Today, for the third year out of four, the Chancellor forecast a decline in unemployment, but a growth of 3 per cent. or so in GDP after an average of only 1·25 per cent. per year since 1979 is unlikely to do more than arrest the upward trend. The Chancellor's mini-Budget has brought us no nearer a policy for employment in south Yorkshire, as opposed to employment figures, than we were before.

Where recruitment has picked up following the recession, many south Yorkshire firms are reporting skill shortages due to the lack of apprentice training during the recession. Here my comments bear out those of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. In a recent survey by the Engineering Employers Sheffield Association, 15 per cent. of companies forecast shortages in basic trades such as milling, turning and grinding.

How can the Chancellor assist? He can make a start by providing for Treasury approval of customs clearance to allow the location of an international freight transshipment terminal in south Yorkshire following completion of the Channel tunnel. In the view of Sheffield city council and the Sheffield chamber of commerce, the rail marshalling yard at Tinsley in my constituency would be a choice location.

The Chancellor is also the key to successful implementation of the south Yorkshire integrated operation programme, a remarkable demonstration of self-help and Yorkshire grit intended to pull together a series of private and public actions and investments in south Yorkshire for economic recovery. The programme will seek to expand the number and range of job opportunities, to increase skills in the work force, to develop community enterprise, to mitigate the effects of unemployment, to improve the environment and to lay the foundations for the renewal of growth in the local economy and thus to reduce the disparity between south Yorkshire and more prosperous areas in the south of England. Where appropriate, the programme will draw on financial interventions from the European Community. It will also look to Whitehall for assistance, for example, through the urban programme and urban aid, the derelict land grant, enterprise zones and general and sectoral assistance available from the Department of Trade and Industry. It will also look to the resources of local authorities and public bodies, the private and the voluntary sector.

I think that the House will follow my final plea when I say that only a sympathetic Chancellor who is really interested and who monitors the progress of this exercise in self help up there in Yorkshire can assure a sustained programme, integrated by the combined use of financial instruments and focusing on key problems and opportunities throughout south Yorkshire. My challenge to the Chancellor, therefore, is to join those public and private bodies in south Yorkshire to help regain confidence in an area which has been traumatised through structural economic change. In so doing, the Chancellor will also be helping himself by restoring the manufacturing base of our economy and paving the way for a breakout from seven years' stagnation in the volume of manufacturing output in this country.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I welcome the Queen's Speech and especially the promise to implement the recommendations of the Nugee report, which is so important for Kensington and all the constituencies in which large numbers of people live in flats in private ownership. For us, legislation cannot come too soon.

The Opposition amendment today returns to the same theme as yesterday in reference to employment and the functioning of the economy; but again it suggests no practical remedies. It is easy to describe the problems, but the electorate is now entitled to ask for concrete solutions. The Opposition have again produced no realistic recommendations. I shall make some specific recommendations of my own.

I hope to have time to consider three aspects of the economy—the size of the effective domestic market, the efficiency of operation of our institutions and the incentives to work and to save. I think that we all agree that free enterprise in Britain is not yet doing as well as we should like; and we should ask ourselves why.

With regard to the effective domestic market, we have allowed the sterling area to disintegrate but we have not attached ourselves to the dollar and I do not think that it would be possible to go into the yen area. We have been in the Common Market since 1973, but we are still not fully exploiting the opportunities that it offers. The Government have shown courage and foresight in accepting the European Single Act and supporting the programme for the completion of the internal market. The target year of 1992 set by Jacques Delors for the completion of the internal market is not impossibly soon. We owe a great deal to the enthusiasm of Lord Cockfield in Brussels and Basil de Ferranti in Strasbourg for making it a realisable possibility.

When I was in Strasbourg in 1981, I was appointed rapporteur for the integration of the European market for capital, which was then regarded as a hopelessly remote and virtually unattainable objective. Indeed, people told me that it was quixotic and unrealistic of me to take on the rapporteurship. However, in Brussels this week my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has won the support of the Council of Ministers for measures to make the integration of the European market for capital a reality well before the Commission's target date.

We are thus making some progress in giving British businessmen and manufacturers an effective domestic market large enough for free enterprise to function efficiently; but the currency frontiers still remain. Europe is still repeating the mistakes of the 1930s. It is unrealistic to hope that over time we shall be able to compete with businesses and industries which are able to operate in the enormous single currency zones associated with Tokyo and New York, while the European Community has no monetary centre and the Common Market operates as a multi-currency area.

This leads me into the controversy about the possible inclusion of sterling in the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. I hope that I shall not shock my colleagues if I do not share their enthusiasm for joining the mechanism immediately. No one could be keener than I am to achieve monetary integration in Europe as quickly as possible; but I have never recommended joining the EMS as it stands. As I have said in the House before, we would run the risk of creating a monetary solar system with two suns moving eccentrically. London and Frankfurt are not yet sufficiently closely integrated for us to make a success of joining the EMS as it stands. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is therefore right to be cautious.

We should join the exchange rate system only when we have recognised what it will mean and have made a conscious decision to accept the substantial consequences. To announce that exchange rates will be stabilised first and to grapple with the consequences afterwards might well be disastrous and I am not convinced that it would achieve the results that British business and industry yearn for. It might well lead to higher rather than lower interest rates and a return to the overvaluation of the pound, which has been the main inhibiting factor holding our economy back from the achievement of really profitable participation in the Common Market ever since we joined.

Lasting currency stability means much closer co-operation. Indeed, it means the full integration of policy between the central banks in regard to capital market conditions, between Finance and Trade Ministers in the national Governments and between the stock exchanges and financial institutions in all the main business centres. I am sure that we must prepare to accept all those things, but we are still very far from doing so.

A single currency zone in Europe might be achieved by an act of political will as it was in Switzerland, Germany, Italy and indeed in Britain in the past; or it might be done simply by the pressure of events. I hope that the British Government will rely on both. As more and more people take advantage of the options which are opening up in the newly liberated European capital markets, they may prefer not to use their national currencies but to carry on their transactions in an alternative currency in the same way as they were able to do before 1914. I believe that that would be a fruitful development for western Europe.

Before the first world war, the gold standard was generally accepted as the foundation of the national credit and currency systems. The British Government should now be working to restore the benefits of the gold standard to Europe without its disadvantages. We need a single European currency as a measure and store of value universally accepted throughout the community. To achieve that result we have to contemplate the amalgamation of the reserves of the central banks, a single real rate of interest underlying the currencies throughout the system and the close integration of the national systems of taxation. I believe that we know in our hearts what has to be done to make private enterprise a real success. The question is, have we the will?

I should like to deal now with the efficiency of British business and administrative institutions. I have said many times in the House that minor changes in company law could strengthen the supervision and functioning of many of our public companies and improve the quality of management. The Government should also now commit themselves to a policy of extreme simplification of public administration — for its own sake, and to provide a better service, especially in the various stages of the redistribution of income. We have to admit that large areas of British public administration are grossly over-manned and crassly inefficient. That is because Parliament is not giving the necessary leads towards reform.

On the tax side we need armies of collectors because our tax systems are so antiquated and complex. Tens of thousands of people are needed in the Inland Revenue and hundreds of thousands of man-hours are wasted by employers, professional advisers and private citizens to meet their obligations as part-time tax collectors and to lighten their own tax burdens. All their efforts produce nothing of any value.

To operate our various antiquated and inadequate systems of income support, huge efforts are expended in unnecessary personal casework. We have learnt from parliamentary answers that the staff of the Department of Health and Social Security are required to make more than 90 million manual entries every week in the administration of national insurance and supplementary benefit. We have also learnt that there are now 14 million people relying wholly or partly on means-tested benefits.

The free enterprise economy functions because the citizens have confidence that it is worth while to work and save. However, the reliance of successive Governments on the means test to support family incomes—now politely called selectivity — is producing an unhealthy phenomenon. This is the emergence of a sub-culture of millions of people who are coming to rely on means-tested benefits rather than their own energies, skills and initiative. There is ample room for drastic savings of effort to lighten the dead weight we are imposing on our own economy by our obsolete methods.

That brings me to the question of incentives to work and save. It is recognised that many British citizens have little motive, if any, for working or saving. That is the result of relying on the means test as the measure of eligibility for benefit. How do we tackle these well-known problems? I should like to make four specific recommendations.

First, we should look at the effective marginal rates of tax at the different levels of the income ranges. I welcome the Government's commitment to lower taxation. Obviously, that is a long-term policy which has to be right for free enterprise and the running of the economy. For the health of the economy, we should now be looking to relieve the pressures at the top and the bottom of the scale, rather than in the middle. In the middle ranges, the marginal tax on earned income is now 38 per cent. and on investment income it is 29 per cent. For the benefit of incentives as well as the enormous administrative advantages, I recommend, as I have done before, that we should now proceed to end higher rate tax altogether. At least it should be no higher than the generally applicable rate for earned income, that is about 40 per cent. I was a little dismayed that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in her interview given to the Financial Times, was not quite as ambitious and courageous as I would like in regard to the reduction of higher rate tax.

Secondly, for hundreds of thousands of people with families, the most cost-effective way to restore incentives to work is to raise child benefit. To increase the allowance for every child requires a big movement of purchasing power. Therefore, I suggest that we should start with children under five; after five, families begin to get the support of the school system. If revenue is buoyant at Budget time, I suggest that we should raise child benefit for the under-fives to £12 a week. The cost would not be as large as it might at first appear, because so many of the children are already receiving substantial support because their families are obliged to apply for supplementary benefit.

Thirdly, we should put income tax on a strictly personal, unisex basis. It is wrong that women and men should be treated differently under our income tax system. Women who are widows, divorced, co-habitees, single women or mothers in single-parent families should all be treated the same, and treated the same as men. It is not sufficient to tinker with ideas of transferable allowances. We must go forward at once to a single unisex income tax system.

Fourthly, we should now start the first phase of the full integration of the tax and benefit systems. I welcome the support which my long-standing campaign is now receiving from both sides of the House. A tax credit scheme, or a basic income guarantee, need not be prohibitively expensive. It could be introduced on a revenue-neutral basis. I am perfectly willing to recommend that it should. Suppose we ended tax allowances and instead introduced a basic income system at about half the present rate of supplementary benefit: we would give millions of people the choice to apply either for the balance of their entitlement on present terms, or go out into the economy and make the best of their opportunities with the full benefit of their tax credits, even on low wages. I cannot estimate how many people would seek to take advantage of the option to remain free of the means test on those terms, but I think that it might amount to a large number. Every one of them would represent a saving to the Exchequer and a gain to the economy.

If the free enterprise system is to work as fruitfully in Britain in the future as it did in the past, we must throw off the burdens we have imposed on ourselves through prejudice, inefficiency and our obsolete conventions.

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): Looking round the Chamber, I wonder whether the fact that only two Labour Members are in attendance reflects the fact that our contribution to the debate is almost worthless because, when a vote takes place, we will lost whatever contribution we have made. There are nine Conservative Members present. No doubt that is dictated by a complacency born of the fact that they are undoubtedly going to win the vote. It makes me look at what I have to say and wonder whether it is worth while.

The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) referred to motive. Any Queen's Speech should contain the motivations that should exist in our society. Inevitably, an economic debate, and a debate on employment and industry such as we had yesterday, provide the basis for considerable overlap. I am concerned to put a point of view that our motivation in society should be simply to meet people's needs. I represent a constituency with a major housing shortage, which is not unusual. Many people there live in houses that are in need of radical repair. Many are short of housing accommodation. Meeting such need seems to me to be an absolute priority.

The needs that most people have are in education, the need for a reasonable standard of living, in health and social services, freedom from want and so on. Manufacturing is vital—it may be said that I am stating the obvious—to meet those needs. Since 1979, as has been said by previous speakers, manufacturing has fallen markedly. We have had a 30 per cent. increase in manufactured imports. Capital is flowing out of Britain. From 1980 to 1986, £97,000 million has flowed out of Britain, at a time when there has been a 59 per cent. fall in the construction of houses, to take the example of housing. How can we talk about morality in our society when we are prepared to allow such an outflow of capital while people are desperately in need of housing, to mention only one example?

We have had a 30 per cent. increase in defence expenditure. In education, there has been a fall in expenditure, in real terms. The figures show that there have been major increases in health and social security expenditure, but massive poverty has been created over the past seven years. The oil revenues have been largely frittered away on unemployment and supplementary benefits. One is forced to ask how and why there is that continuous economic crisis. The basic, fundamental reason is that the motivation, the causation, is production for profit, not production for use. That determines the nature of the decisions that are made and who makes them — the multinationals, the corporations, the conglomerates, those who determine what profit margins are acceptable, or unacceptable, and what needs to be done in that regard. Those decisions are not about people's needs and how to meet them.

The investment criterion—private money, of course—is what is profitable for shareholders, not what needs must be met for our people and those in less fortunate parts of the world. Inevitably, the question emerges: who owns? This is where power resides. On both sides of the House, the debate has mostly been about the management of capitalism. Perhaps that is inevitable, given the present circumstances. Social ownership has a major contribution to make, and the sooner the better. I recall the words of John Ball in 1348, who paid with his life in consequence. He said that things in Britain will not be right until all things are held common.

The Government will never work towards that end, but the next Labour Government must begin that process if the next century is to see the real social change and human progress that we need.

8.6 pm

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): There have been some unusual contributions to the debate, I think because it started in a phoney pre-election fever, which seemed to permeate several contributions. It may also be because very recently we had another economic debate. Perhaps this one follows too closely upon that one's heels.

None the less, there have been several comments on the autumn statement. I hope that we can comment on a later occasion. When the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service has had an opportunity to analyse the statement and take evidence from the Chancellor, as we hope to do tomorrow, we shall have a better basis for a more thorough analysis of what is in the statement.

I do not want to discuss the statement, but I should like to pick up certain aspects of the Queen's Speech that I welcome enthusiastically, and comment on them. One passage reads:

> "My Government will make vigorous efforts to combat international terrorism and trafficking in drugs."

The problem of drug abuse is the most important and dangerous social problem that we shall face in the coming decade. Therefore, I welcome what is said in the Queen's Speech but I stress to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor the need to increase resources. The machinery for ministerial co-operation on the issue, covering as it must the Home Office, the Treasury, the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of Education and

[Mr. Terence Higgins]

Science and other Departments such as Customs and Excise, has been well organised, but the fact is that the tremendous profits that are being made out of the human misery that results from drug trafficking are giving those engaged in it resources that are enormous — so enormous that they may well be much greater than those that the Government themselves are putting in to combat it. That being so, we must bear that in mind when considering the operation that we have to mount if we are to win the battle, which will do more to reduce human misery than anything else I can think of.

Therefore, I commend that passage of the speech to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. We also need to monitor carefully how successful we are being in eliminating the importation of drugs. It is difficult to estimate. Constantly, the Customs and Excise or the police manage to stop the importation of drugs, but we do not know how much that is, in relation to the total amount that is being imported or produced. In that context, it is important to monitor what is happening to the street price of the various narcotics as a sign, as demand for the drugs is not going down, whether we are really succeeding in the battle.

Another passage in the Queen's Speech reads:

"My Government's firm monetary and fiscal policies will continue to restrain inflation and foster the conditions necessary for further sustained economic growth."

That immediately raises the question of precisely what the Government's monetary and fiscal policies are. We must all recognise that there have been substantial changes in those policies since 1979. Reference has already been made to the various monetary indicators which have been emphasised, or not emphasised, in the course of the evolution of Government policy.

Indeed, some years ago now, the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee pointed out that there had been no true monetarist experiment. That is still the case. We have not had the kind of monetarist experiment envisaged by Professor Milton Friedman. But, clearly, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is now adopting a far more pragmatic approach than was previously the case. I wonder whether the time has come for us to reappraise the basis of economic policy, because we need an analytical basis for what the Government are doing. At the moment, that is far from clear.

Lord Keynes, an unfashionable author nowadays, in the most famous economic quotation of all in the closing passages of "The General Theory", pointed out the extent to which the views of what he described as "defunct economists" had an influence on policy. He went on to say that he did not think that anyone was able to absorb those ideas after 25 or 30 years of age. That was a rather depressing attitude to take. However, we need to look at the analytical framework.

This autumn my right hon. Friend has, for the first time, published a view of what the PSBR should be in the spring — something which he has not previously done. However, I have increasing doubts about whether the PSBR, which is perhaps the only constant in the various variables which the Chancellor and his predecessor have discussed, is the right indicator for us to take into account. Clearly, although it has the advantage of familiarity, and there is a clear link before it and the monetary indicator, sterling M3, none the less it is seriously distorted by asset sales, although one can make adjustment for that, and it does not distinguish between the extent to which changes in Government borrowing have been due to deliberate action on the Government's part on the one hand or to non-discretionary changes on the other. Nor does it take into account the effect of inflation on the Government's real liabilities.

I come more and more to the view that there is a strong case for looking at the real net financial debt rather than the PSBR as an indicator of fiscal stance, and, indeed, to extend beyond that so that we pay more attention to what is happening to the Government's balance sheet. Strangely enough, while ever since the war we have had figures for national income and expenditure, we have not had a satisfactory series of balance sheets. I believe seriously that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should consider producing those on an annual basis.

It is strange that we treat economic growth as the equivalent of a company's turnover, whereas what is happening to the company's net worth is a much better indication of the overall position. At the moment we have no regular series of economic indicators showing what is happening to the Government or the country's net worth. Therefore, I hope that we can make some developments there. I suspect that that could provide a better framework for the operation of economic policy than we have at present.

I want to refer to two other passages in the Gracious Speech. The first relates to the exchange rate, and so on. I followed with interest the exchange between the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I believe that we will go through a difficult period financially because, as the general election approaches—it may come soon or it may come later—there will be growing downward pressure on the sterling exchange rate because of fear of the consequences of a possible Labour victory, or, indeed, even more so, the consequences of a hung Parliament. I do not believe for one moment that either of those things will come to pass, but, none the less, there may well be those who do. Faced with the prospect of the kind of economic policies which are held up to us by those on the Opposition Benches, that is bound to have a serious effect on confidence and, in turn, on the sterling exchange rate.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said that he would not wish to see the exchange rate any lower. We shall need to consider tomorrow exactly what that interesting statement means. But at all events, the possibility to which I have referred, or the concern about the possibility to which I have referred, against the background of my right hon. Friend's statement, will increasingly put pressure on interest rates in an upward direction.

Therefore, I come, like many of those who have spoken today, to believe that this may well be the appropriate time for us to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. That would provide a framework within which the pressures that I have just mentioned could perhaps be more easily resisted.

We have seen a substantial alterations in relative parities. In simple terms, if one believes that one basically buys imports in terms of dollars and sells exports in terms of deutschmarks, the change which we have seen since the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee last took a rather balanced view as to whether we should or should not join the exchange rate mechanism, has radically changed. We have seen a substantial depreciation in relation to the deutschmark, which now makes us much more competitive.

That raises another point which is worth considering. A number of commentators have considered that problems are coming on the balance of payments side. They may well under-estimate the extent to which the depreciation that we have seen against the deutschmark will, given the well-known J-curve effect, result in some improvement in our export performance—although, for reasons I have mentioned, because we have not changed significantly in relation to the dollar, it may not significantly alter the situation with regard to imports.

Finally, I want to refer to the passage in the Gracious Speech relating to work within the European Community:

"My Government will . . . work to promote enterprise and employment; to remove barriers to internal trade; . . . and for continuing reform of the Common Agricultural Policy."

That is an area in which the Government must take a much tougher line than they have taken so far.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), the former Labour Prime Minister, referred to the need to repatriate the common agricultural policy. I think that he really meant repatriate agricultural policy. But at all events, I am not as optimistic as The Economist was this week, in an article headed "Dairy, prairie", saying that the system is now so absurd that it is bound to break down and lead to improvements soon. I am afraid that that is grossly optimistic. The article lists the distortions which take place in that area in Japan, in the United States — where they have taken a much tougher line on the farm problem—and, most of all——

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): That article was very good and it set out the extent to which subsidies are now being increased in America. If my right hon. Friend looks at that article, he will see that the increase in dollars is enormous. Perhaps he would favour the House by reading that paragraph out.

Mr. Higgins: My hon. Friend refers to that, but it covers a lengthy period and I was referring to the more recent position, which he and I have both examined at close quarters in Washington.

But given the importance of the matter, there is a strong case for a major international conference concentrating not on trade in general, or this or that horse trade, but specifically on the agricultural problem. The CAP is not capable of reform and the "continuing reform" of the CAP referred to in the Gracious Speech is not possible. It is fundamentally flawed in the way in which it operates.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was rather selective in the figures which he quoted in respect of the EEC because he picked out only one of the two lines on it that appeared in the autumn statement, and that was the one which suited his argument. The CAP is becoming a very heavy burden upon us. I hope that, as it will be a repeat, if we are not careful, of a previous saga — my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury knows well what I am referring to—we shall not increase the resources that are available to the Community until such time as we have had the substitution of a better system for the present system of support for agriculture.

I believe that the Queen's Speech in general is greatly to be welcomed. It contains a number of proposals, not least for law and order, which I welcome, and it is right that we should support it when the Division takes place this evening.

8.21 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I begin by seeking some guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) sought to move the amendment that stands in his name and the names of others of my right hon. and hon. Friends, he was told that he must do so later this evening. As the alliance has about only one Division a year that it can succeed in calling, I am rather anxious to ensure that whatever the procedure is for moving the amendment is followed and fulfilled. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether I have formally to move the amendment now, or whether my right hon. Friend the Member for Devonport has already done so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman does not have now to move formally the amendment to which he has referred. When we reach the end of the debate, the House will come to a decision first on the official Opposition's amendment. Secondly, it will come to a decision on the amendment that is in the names of the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Penhaligon: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would not like to be blamed as the one who did not do whatever was necessary.

The section of the speech of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) which interested me most was that dealing with drugs. I concur with everything that he said on the subject, but I believe that we are under-estimating the significance of the problem in our society.

I take issue with those who say that the fashionable methods will succeed in driving drugs out of the country. If I were to be involved in the obscene trade of drugs, the last thing that I would consider would be to bring drugs through the prescribed entry points. I would become involved in the enormous yachting business that I see active off the southern coast of my county during the summer season. Some yachts are large and have an enormous capacity, and I would use one of those to bring whatever it was I wished to bring into a Cornish creek at a quarter to four in the morning.

I do not believe that we shall ever be able to afford to employ enough customs officials to guard every creek in my county, let alone the rest of the country. I understand that the coastline of Cornwall extends for about 250 miles. I see that the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) is in his place; the same can be said for Devon.

We should at least consider the possibility of bribing for information. We should consider giving substantial sums to those who are willing to give information that leads to the arrest and imprisonment of those who bring drugs into the country. I accept that we would be using one part of the drugs fraternity against another, but I believe that the Government will have to consider this approach at some stage. It is an historic fact that smuggling in Cornwall was not stopped by legislation enacted in London or by inspectors being planted on the cliffs. It was stopped by offering bribes for information from Cornishmen so that it would be known when the running would take place. Cornishmen, being as greedy as anyone else, saw an opportunity to make money legally, and they used it. The result was the end of the trade.

[Mr. Penhaligon]

The drugs business is a serious matter and some of the methods that have been put forward for combating it will cost a great deal of money. I am one of those who are willing to argue for expenditure in this area, but it must be seen to produce results. I am not sure whether the conventional methods are likely to have that effect.

It has been said by some that there was a fair amount of electionmongering in the earlier contributions to the debate. It seems that the impression created by those who spoke earlier in the debate was such that nearly every other hon. Member decided to leave this place for his constituency to fight the next general election. We have not really been pushed for Bench space ever since the early stages of the debate.

There are some important issues to be raised, and many of them have already been covered for the alliance by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devonport. The Government's policy which concerns me most is that on interest rates. I do not wish to say on behalf of the alliance that if I were in control of the economy I would never have recourse to high interest rates, because one learns in politics that never is a very long time. To say that one would never use the weapon that Chancellors of the Exchequer have used over the years would be clearly irresponsible.

The interest rate that we are running is high and has been high in relation to the rates of our competitors for a long time. It is not the economic bedrock on which we can hope to see a recovery of the economy. Over three months, the figures are as follows: the United Kingdom 11 per cent.; Canada, 8·5 per cent.; France, just over 7·5 per cent.; Germany, 4·75 per cent.; Japan 4·3 per cent.; Switzerland under 4 per cent.; the United States 5·5 per cent.; and Italy 11·5 per cent. These days we have regularly to compare ourselves with Italy if we wish to find another country that is in our league of economic "success".

I challenge the Minister who is to reply to name any country in modern economic history—to be generous, let us allow him to go back to the beginning of the century—which has managed to rebuild its economic base on the real interest rates that exist now. If the Civil Service can help the Minister to find an example, I shall have to confess that it has discovered something that I could not find. I do not know of a country which has run the interest rate regime that now prevails here for any sustained period and succeeded in rebuilding its economy during that period.

I attend Treasury questions, as do many of the right hon. and hon. Members who are now in the Chamber. We ask questions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and we are rather shocked when occasionally we receive answers. In brief moments of great honesty the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made it clear that our high interest rates have nothing to do with the public sector borrowing requirement. If there were that relationship, we would have to argue that the Chancellor of the Exchequer increased interest rates a couple of weeks ago because he knew that he would increase spending in a couple of weeks time, and would need more money as a result.

We all know that that is not the position and that interest rates have nothing to do with the PSBR. I should not like that observation to be stretched to infinity, but within the area that we are discussing there is no relationship between the two. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made it clear that he is maintaining the current interest rate regime to defend the exchange rate of our currency. The policy has not been noticeably successful as the weeks and months have passed and considerable depreciations have taken place. It is often forgotten in economic debates that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's policy is successful, Britain's exports will be more expensive than they would otherwise have been. It means that imports into Britain are cheaper than they would otherise have been. Therefore, the sector of British industry that relies for its survival on successful exporting finds it more difficult than it would otherwise have done. It also means that the sector of British industry which competes for its survival against imports into the country is in a more difficult position than it would otherwise have been.

If one wished to concoct a policy to reduce our manufacturing capacity over a sustained period, one would pursue the policy that has been followed for the past few years. Many of our international businesses have already gone. I do not mean that they are half the size that they were; I mean that they have gone. That has led to the horrifying figures which have been given several times during the debate regarding our manufacturing balance of payments and our loss of value added in that sector.

I do not offer the House simple solutions. I say bluntly to whoever is willing to listen that pay rises in Britain are too high. That has been true for several years. The fact that the well-off are even greedier at present than some others is a second, obscene, aspect of my general point. I am saying, for the benefit of Britain, that pay rises are too high. The alliance believes that, unless we can reduce the pay increases which have dominated the economy for the past few years, our industrial capacity will have no future.

The only substantial argument against joining the European monetary system is a fatalistic belief that under no circumstances can we control our pay demands. But those who understand the disciplines of the monetary system must recognise that if in the future Britain's pay rises are twice as high as those in other countries in the EMS, we might look back on these high interest rates and say that these were the good days. I do not accept that argument. Several Conservative Members have said that British pay policies have never worked and never will. We have never introduced a pay policy as a point of strategy or as the result of a mandate given to one party by the British people. We have never made such a policy part of our economic life. I remember three or four policies, every one of which was introduced as a last minute panic button pushed by whoever was occupying the Chancellor's chair at that moment because he was so desperate that he had to do something.

Even in such emergencies, some of the pay policies worked, at least for a while. But the British people may determine that pay increases cannot continue as they are if we wish to do anything about our industrial base. The British people may respond in such a way that a pay policy would be possible. I am confident that, if we cannot reduce pay settlements from their present level, Britain's economic health will decline.

On the autumn statement, the Government are in the most fragile position. They are heavily dependent upon the consumer boom in the high streets. I wonder how much a smartly dressed person with a half-decent job could succeed in borrowing within 24 hours—not in one week or a lifetime—if he walked from one end of Oxford street to the other, taking advantage of each shop's plastic cards and going into banks. We can all see that consumer boom happening, but Conservative Members are afraid to say anything about it because it is crucial to the Government's handling of the economy. The consumer boom is happening on borrowed money. It cannot be maintained for long. It has become the entire fabric of future Government strategy, because they rely on their tax break when that borrowed money is spent to balance their books. When the Chancellor says that he received £2 billion more in revenues than he expected, he is saying that the tax break from the borrowing boom has given him that £2 billion.

Not only the Chancellor's unexpected income, but the moderate release from ever-escalating unemployment, have occurred on the back of the borrowing boom. It is the engine of the small growth in jobs and the Government's increased income. If the Chancellor maintains that strategy, the election had better come sooner rather than later. It might just be possible to blame someone else after one term of office, but after a couple of terms of office, it is clear that the chickens are coming home to roost. It is certain that there will be no rebuilding of our industrial base on the back of the borrowing boom. There will be no training of high technology skills. We shall not obtain the degrees and PhDs that we need if we are to succeed in rebuilding that base part of our economy on which we have relied for years to provide our basic living standards, and on which many of us believe we shall have to rely again.

All those long-term visions of reconstruction and of rebuilding Britain's economy are being put at risk on the back of a borrowing boom. It is one of the most disgraceful policies to have come from a Chancellor in a long time. It is short-sighted and narrow-minded. It is not good news for Britain, and the sooner there is an election and we can return to doing something to rebuild the economy—preferably with a great movement of places in the House—the better it will be for Britain.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): The expressions of regret from the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) about the decline of the British economy would have commanded more respect if they had been accompanied by some remorse, since he was one of the hon. Members who propped up the Labour Government for two years and delayed the recovery of the economy for that period.

No doubt the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) have been anxious to urge on the Chancellor the need for an early election, because they are beginning to fear that if the unemployment trend, which for the past two years most people have agreed is the most important indicator, starts to come down, who knows where it may have reached by March 1988, with another year of 3 per cent. growth?

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Devonport is leaving the Chamber. He would not allow me to intervene during his speech, but I wish to say one thing to him. He made it clear that he favours an incomes policy, which must, sooner or later, mean a statutory incomes policy, and that he favours a tighter monetary policy, but he did not say much about the tax policy of the SDP. Earlier this year, we read much about the controversy in the SDP over the paper which advocated a substantial increase in the taxation of middle-income groups. That would be much more redistributive than anything that the Labour party has dared to mention. Does his reluctance to mention that herald an announcement soon that the SDP will dump that policy paper? Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify the SDP position on that?

I strongly support the measures in the Queen's Speech and I commend them especially if they will mean that the House will have a shorter Sessions. It would be popular on both sides of the House to rise at the beginning of July rather than at the end.

As the amendments today relate to the economy, I shall speak primarily on economic and financial issues. The debate has been far-reaching. I strongly supported the references made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and by the former Labour Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) to ending the lunacies of the common agricultural policy. I also admired the way in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) managed to bring into the debate the American shipment of arms to Iran. I, too, deplore that involvement.

I strongly welcome the autumn statement and the spending increases that it disclosed. In many ways, those were in line with calls made by many of my hon. Friends, and I hope that we will not be punished for having been a little in advance of the Chancellor in suggesting that additional expenditure would not only do a lot of good, but would also be in tune with popular requests.

We now have a properly balanced approach to the use of the resources being generated by our economic growth. We see real increases in spending, but we are still achieving a reduction in the percentage of gross domestic product taken by the public sector. That is the right path and is in line with true Conservative philosophy—neither wet nor dry. I appreciate that the spending is not high enough to satisfy the Opposition, and it was not quite clear how much more spending the Alliance would like to see. It seems to be in need of a rethink on that, as on so many other things in its policy.

The economic future looks good. Prospects for growth seem satisfactory, trending just below 3 per cent., but that is acceptable by the standards of the last 15 years. Even on unemployment, we at last see some positive signs. Obviously, it may still be early days and I do not wish to count chickens before they are hatched, but if through the period of the next Parliament we can continue to achieve economic growth of around 3 per cent. a year, and given that the huge increase in the labour force with which we have had to cope for most of this decade will no longer be a factor, those two things—a static labour force and 3 per cent. growth—could significantly reduce unemployment by the end of the next Parliament.

There are a number of worries in the background. I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup speak about the United States. Insufficient attention is being paid to America's failure to tackle its massive budget deficit and its relative failure to overcome its massive balance of payments deficit. Those two things are storing up immense trouble for the world, and more attention needs to be paid to them in Britain and elsewhere. I would have been comforted if I had known that, during the important discussions about arms control that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had with the President last weekend, at least 50 per cent. of their attention could have been directed towards economic and financial problems.

For the last 60 years, the United States has been the most important and powerful economy in the world and it is a fearsome prospect that it is now becoming a debtor at a massive pace. It will amass over 1 trillion dollars of debt within five years unless urgent action is taken. In the United States, not enough political priority is being attached to tackling the budget deficit and the measures so far taken to deal with the trade deficit have to date been unsuccessful.

If action is not taken on those fronts, the only solutions remaining for the United States are, first, a really massive recession—the classic response to a balance of payments problem. Alternatively, the United States can invoke protectionism on a scale that will eliminate America as a market for other countries. Thirdly, and related mainly to the problem of the budget deficit, there will be runaway inflation. That would have the effect of devaluing the dollar and, to a great extent, it would overcome America's debt problem.

Any one of those three developments has appalling implications for the rest of the world, certainly the rest of the Western world and Latin America. They would probably not have an effect on economic policy in Britain between now and the next general election, but they hold considerable anxieties for Britain. There is the danger of losing an important export market and the consequences of the kind of financial instability that would result from the possibilities I have outlined. We might see much higher interest rates and fluctuations and possibly a weaker pound.

On inflation, there are anxieties looming in the background. I readily acknowledge that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has a good record for forecasting inflation. It is much better than the record of some of the independent commentators spoken about with such respect, and indeed awe, by the right hon. Member for Devonport. The 3·75 per cent. forecast for inflation in 1987 seems to be a trifle optimistic. I hope that the Chancellor is right, but I should not be surprised if for once his record rather fell down. This year, we have enjoyed a considerable, but I am afraid a one-off, reduction in industry's costs. That will certainly not be repeated in 1987. Indeed, to some extent the trend will be reversed. Many hon. Members have spoken about the alarming increase in unit labour costs. That is bad from all points of view, not least because it goes a long way towards undermining the considerable productivity gains that we have made over the past three or four years.

A third risk area is the balance of payments. Here again the forecast, if perhaps not optimistic, shows some danger of overshoot in 1987 and if the market starts to fear that there will be significant overshoot, we will face the prospect of a weaker pound and possibly a hike in interest rates to defend sterling.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) rightly spoke about the money supply. Targets appear to have been juggled a bit and those of us who were already confused are more confused than we were. Common sense suggests that the rate of increase in bank lending and lending by other financial institutions is likely not just to fuel the consumer boom but to lead to a number of people and households becoming over-extended. There is no doubt that in their rush to compete for lending business, some financial institutions are lending in a rather imprudent manner, I suspect that in due course that will have a damaging effect on the economy.

Against the background of all those potential anxieties, I regret, as do other hon. Members, the affirmation by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in a Financial Times interview that there is no prospect of our entering the exchange mechanism of the European monetary system. The arguments quoted in that interview are flimsy in the extreme. The EMS is not a panacea, but whatever the absence of any short-term benefit, it is almost beyond dispute that if we were in the EMS, in the medium term we would be able to run our economy with lower real interest rates.

If we were inside the system, we would probably have a greater and more consistent discipline applied to our monetary policy and both those things would be considerable gains. I fear that if we remain outside the EMS there is a risk that if during the pre-election period our lead in the opinion polls was to dip for any reason —which I am sure is most unlikely—it could lead to a run on sterling of exactly the kind which the Prime Minister says she fears if we were inside the EMS. The consequences will be at least as bad if we are outside and it would be just as necessary to have a painful and perhaps extremely ill-timed rise in interest rates if we faced a run on the pound a month or two before an election.

I was pleased to see the Prime Minister issue what looked like a stern warning that the higher spending that we have now agreed has reduced the scope for tax cuts. Of course it has, and most of us who have advocated increases in spending always recognised that it would. The one thing that does not need stimulating at the moment is consumer demand. We do not need cuts in income tax to boost that. It cannot be said that the reduction in income tax has stopped extremely inflationary wage claims. One of the hopes expressed at the time of the reduction was that it would. There does not seem to be any urgent economic reason why we should now go for cuts in income tax.

It might be as well to say openly to the country that if we award teachers a substantial increase in pay—for which there is much popular support—that will have to be done instead of tax cuts. It is a form of tax cut and a proper use of resources. The interest of alliance Members who have spoken is demonstrated by the fact that not one of them is present in the Chamber. It would be politically honest if we presented the alternatives to the electorate in that way. Nevertheless, the buoyancy of revenues from income tax, corporation tax, national insurance contributions and VAT may be sufficient for tax cuts to be considered in the next Budget.

If we reach that point, I hope that we shall consider alternatives to a cut in the basic rate of income tax. In the Financial Times interview, the Prime Minister made it clear that her overriding wish is to help the lower paid. Statistically, everybody earning up to £15,000 a year—the vast majority of workers—would gain more from a cut in employee national insurance contributions than from a cut in the basic rate of income tax.

National insurance contributions are effectively part of the basic rate of tax. Income tax stands at 29 per cent. and employees' national insurance contributions stand at 9 per cent., amounting to a 38 per cent. deduction from all earnings up to £15,000 a year. In 1979, the basic rate of income tax was 33 per cent., while employee national insurance contributions amounted to 6·5 per cent. The basic rate, therefore, was effectively 39·5 per cent. Although the basic rate of income tax has been reduced from 33 per cent. to 29 per cent., we have negated it by more than half through raising employee national insurance contributions from 6·5 per cent. to 9 per cent. Priority ought to be given, therefore, to reducing employee national insurance contributions to 6·5 per cent. That would be the best way to use resources to help the low paid.

Those receiving investment income would not benefit from lower national insurance contributions, but a fair amount has already been done for them. It is not the most needy group. The other group that might be affected if all the resources were used for cuts in national insurance would be the pensioners. However, they could be helped by means of the age allowance. I hope that my colleagues on the Treasury Bench will consider that in their pre-Budget discussions how our resources may be used to reduce the burden of taxation.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) said that there should also be a cut in employers' national insurance contributions. I agree with him. It would have a direct effect on business costs. Long before 1985, we abolished the surcharge. In 1985 we made further cuts in employers' national insurance contributions, which were directed especially at the lower paid. I hope that we shall be able to go further down that road.

This year I wholeheartedly support the Queen's Speech and the autumn statement. I am delighted that the official Opposition and the alliance were able to put down irrelevant amendments. It is gratifying to feel, for once, that we on these Benches seem to be more than usually united.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) will not mind if I do not take up the points that he has made.

The debate was opened by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, who referred at length to poverty. What he said about poverty has to be taken in the context of the general debate about public expenditure. I had assumed that the attack upon Government policy would be that there had been insufficient public expenditure. Therefore, I was confused by his intervention today. He criticised the Government for having indulged in too much public expenditure. That seemed to me to be somewhat strange.

Despite the curtailments and discipline that this Government have imposed upon themselves, they can reasonably claim, nevertheless, that they are a Government of high public expenditure. To that extent they are just the same as the Labour party. What separates the two parties is that on this side of the House there is a fairly clear recognition that the only way to provide the money that needs to be spent on a whole range of social issues is to encourage further growth in the economy and, if necessary, to use the proceeds of the sale of enterprises that have been privatised. Those are enterprises in which for the most part the Government should never have been involved anyway.

That has to be contrasted with one particular theme of Labour party policy: that wealth is a fixed commodity which unjustifiably is in the hands of the rich and that all that one needs to do in order to benefit the poor is to take money away from the rich and spend it on the poor. It is the old cry that we have heard before, that one can help the poor by the fiscal pillaging of the rich.

For example, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) referred to squeezing the rich until the pips squeaked. We have heard it more recently from the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. He plans to finance a truly massive amount of social spending by the penal taxation of those earning more than £30,000 a year. His figures have been thoroughly discredited. The right hon. Gentleman knows that, if he were to confiscate all income in excess of £30,000 a year, it would raise only a fraction of the money that would be necessary to fund his spending programme. To that extent, therefore, that particular fox has been shot. People realise that it would be impossible to fund such a spending programme.

Even if the right hon. Gentleman's figures were false, it is obvious that his argument has some attractions. However, it is slightly strange to see Labour Front Bench spokesmen, with reputed incomes well into six figures, calling for increased taxes on the rich. However, they know that even if they had to pay a little more tax, they would still have far more left than the rest of us.

This Government have abolished the investment income surcharge, which has reduced the higher rates of tax. The Government are also committed to the abolition of capital transfer tax. The Conservative party is prepared to say that "wealth" is not a dirty word. Even members of the Conservative party who do not possess wealth are happy to say that. If the argument went no further than that, the idea that one could soak the rich to help the poor would have some attraction, but if we want to turn the rhetoric of compassion into the reality of care we have to ask ourselves whether that system can produce the money that will turn that rhetoric into reality. On precisely that point, what we have heard from the Labour party, despite its undoubted sincerity, does not being to hold water.

Until May 1986, such a statement could have been made without anything substantial to back it up, but the debate has changed radically since May, when the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asked the Government to say what proportion of the total tax take was contributed by the highest earners in the country. He put down that question thinking that, because this Government had apparently reduced the burden of taxation on the rich, the answer would be that the rich were paying less tax. He found precisely the opposite. Between the last year that Labour was in office and the year 1985-1986, the top 5 per cent. of earners have paid an increased amount of total tax take.

If that information seemed startling, it was no more than we had already seen in the United States. There, when the tax rate on the highest earners was reduced from 70 per cent. to 50 per cent., the top earners paid not $34 billion into the tax kitty but $42 billion.

There is other evidence. Perhaps the most dramatic example was given to me in a reply by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on 6 November. He said:

"In 1978-79 . . . 3·5 per cent. of taxpayers . . . paid tax at higher rates. They contributed 20 per cent. of the total income tax yield . . . In 1986-87, about 5 per cent. of taxpayers pay at higher rates and they contribute 27 per cent. of the yield." — [Official Report, 6 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 519.]

[Mr. Patrick Nicholls]

Those figures speak for themselves. We all suspected that they would be the case. Now it is not theory but irrefutable evidence, which comes from the Inland Revenue, and would presumably be accepted on both sides of the House as accurate.

In the light of that evidence, to call for an increase in taxation as a direct way to help the poor is a calculated deceit. It does not work that way, not because of some quirk of arithmetic but because no policy that has as its avowed intent the pillaging of one section of society by another can be right. One does not have to quote well-known excerpts from John Donne to understand that. However, it furthers the language of the class war. What possible relevance have the ravings of class warriors to the good of society?

I can welcome the measures set out in the Gracious Speech because in all respects, and certainly with regard to the economy, those policies benefit not just one section of society at the expense of another but society as a whole. That is the business that the Conservative party is in. The pity of it is that the rhetoric from the Labour party in the country promotes the idea that one strengthens the weak by weakening the rich. These policies are designed not to benefit society as a whole but to resurrect and inflame class war. That cannot be right, in the interests of society as a whole.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): A consensus has emerged on the Conservative Benches about tax cuts. We came to that consensus from different positions. It is not particularly useful to be like the Irishman and say, "I would not have started from there." I regret that public expenditure has once again risen in a way that was not anticipated and I regard that increase in public expenditure of about £10 billion over two years as no small matter. I have always preferred to see the funds of the nation fructify in the pockets of the citizen rather than be spent by the bureaucrats. However, anything I have to say about that will not be of any importance, so I might as well face the fact that that money will be spent. However, certain consequences flow from it.

The Government are giving a dangerous impression to many people, in the belief that extra expenditure upon both education and health will solve the fundamental problems of those two services. It is obvious that substantial expenditure over a couple of years will not solve the fundamental problem of health, which is that we have a constantly expanding and sophisticated system of health care, meeting an unlimited demand in no way disciplined by price. Unless the Government say at some stage between now and the next general election that there will have to be some different system of financing the Health Service, if we attempt a different system, the Government will come up against a great deal of public opposition on the basis that the public have never anticipated a change in the way in which the Health Service has been financed and that they should have been told before the election, and that they have been conned.

It will not be enough to give 25 per cent. over 18 months to the teachers and think that that will solve all the problems of education. I hope that the Government, having taken this decision to be generous with the taxpayers' money—they are not giving away their own money, as they sometimes put it—that we shall see from now on that the fundamental problems of those two services are satisfactorily and truthfully discussed.

I supported the Government between 1979 and 1983 and thought that I understood the arguments about monetary aggregates. I did not think that they were flawed. In just the same way I recollect supporting the arguments advanced between 1968 and 1971 when again monetary aggregates were thought to be important indicators of future inflation. Now we are taught that all that is wrong and we have returned to the Tory party's attitude towards monetary aggregates between 1971 and 1974. I regret that, but I must face the fact that once again that policy has been abandoned for a period.

We must note some of the consequences of that abandonment. First, the Government will, obviously, find that they borrow money at higher interest rates than if the lenders were satisfied that the Government were constrained by an iron discipline. Secondly, the Government are in considerable difficulty, because, obviously, the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants some form of discipline. He wants the discipline of the European monetary system. I do not want the Government to take the United Kingdom into the EMS because it would be a major denial of our national sovereignty. It is not in any sense a minor or technical matter. I was disappointed when the Prime Minister in her recent interview with the Financial Times said that when we go into the EMS is merely a matter of technicality and timing. It is no such thing. If we join the EMS, we will surrender much of our control over economic policy to the so-called collective wisdom of the European Economic Community.

The consensus that emerged during the debate among Conservative Members was, "All right, so once again we have given way on public expenditure." However, there are consequences and the principal one is that it will be no longer possible to hold out financial hopes of reductions in the standard rate of income tax. I hope that the Chancellor makes that clear. If he does not, he will unsettle the financial markets and he will find it more difficult and expensive to borrow money.

If the Chancellor puts more strain on the interest rate mechanism as he approaches the general election, he will have a disagreeable dilemma ahead of him. Either he uses the interest rate weapon, which is politically disadvantageous, has an immediate effect on the retail price index and makes those who buy their houses fed up with him, or he does nothing about the interest rate weapon and stores up higher future rates of inflation for the country. I hope that he will say, "You, the nation, wanted your extra expenditure, particularly on education and health. We have given it to you, but there are consequences that flow from it. One of the consequences is, sadly, that we shall not be able to reduce the standard rate of income tax, as we had hoped." I was much encouraged by the observations of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the Financial Times recently when she said that most of all she wished to see a reduction in taxation on the low paid.

I expect that you, Mr. Speaker, and many other hon. Members received a document in the post today from the Federation of Master Builders. It points to the ever-present problem of the black economy. One way in which we can reduce its size is to reduce the burden of taxation on the low paid. I hope that we will tell people—particularly the caring classes of the SDP and the alliance, who are so anxious to see increases in public expenditure in the belief that often it is other people's money being spent on their health and their children—that they have partly won but that they cannot have their tax cuts as well. We must now try to reduce the tax burden on the lower paid.

9.10 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We are now approaching the end of our six-day debate on the Gracious Speech. Our debates this year have been given a special edge and flavour because of the almost universal sense that this is the last Queen's Speech of this Parliament, and that its contents could easily be discarded when the Prime Minister decides to cut and run before the end of the Session.

The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) cast some doubt on this when he relayed to the House a report on the statement made by the Prime Minister in an interview earlier today. I, too, have seen the Press Association report of the Prime Minister's interview with ITN's "News at One", and in the midst of an extravagent polemic against the Labour party, she said:

"I do not believe in dashing into an early election. We have a majority and people expect us to carry out the main part of our programme".

That is entirely compatible with going to the country in March, May or June and not later than October. I think that has been very much in the Prime Minister's mind and in the minds of most hon. Members who have taken part in the debates this week.

Indeed, even before the Queen's Speech was read there were unmistakable signs of battle preparations. The Chancellor of the Duchy launched his highly prejudiced and threatening assault on the independence of the BBC; the CBI at its Bournemouth conference silenced all its usual criticisms of Government industrial and economic policies and swung behind the Government with all the discipline of a Guards regiment; and the Chancellor in his autumn statement stunned the City and outraged Mr. Ferdinand Mount of The Spectator, by his sudden conversion to the doctrine of increasing public expenditure —at least for 1987-88 and 1988-89. As we heard a few moments ago, he did not exactly please his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

In the Queen's Speech itself the whiff of the hustings has seldom been absent from Ministers' speeches. The Prime Minister set the tone in her highly combative speech last Wednesday, and the Secretary of State for Education and Science followed with a deliberately provocative speech where he described the complex negotiations over the renumeration, duties and pay structure of the nation's teachers as a "fiasco". On Monday the Secretary of State for the Environment was so keen to attack Labour councils in particular and local government in general that he barely left himself space even to outline the legislative proposals in the Queen's Speech affecting local government.

This afternoon the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a third-rate party political which embarrassed and bored even the hon. Members who sit behind him. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) advised him, he should leave that sort of stuff to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who does it much better and to whom it comes much more naturally, and he should remember that he is still the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Nevertheless, it is not only traditional but specially fitting that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should speak on the final day of this six-day debate, because the right hon. Gentleman was there at the beginning as Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1979—the architect of the economic policies that we are now debating. It was the 1980 Red Book, which carried the right hon. Gentleman's name, that enunciated the Government's central economic doctrines—progressive reduction of the money supply as measured by sterling M3, a reduction of taxation as a proportion of gross national product, and "as a key element in this strategy, a reduction in public expenditure."

The chapter on the medium-term financial strategy ended thus:

"there would be no question of departing from the money supply policy, which is essential for the success of any anti-inflation strategy."

What has happened? Money supply was supposed to fall as long ago as 1983-84 to a range between 4 and 8 per cent. In the event, in the last complete year—1985-86—it was recorded that the outturn of sterling M3 was no less than 16·4 per cent., and all the signs are that it will be higher still in the current year.

The Chancellor now tells us that it was all a great mistake and that M3 money supply does not control or reflect the rate of inflation. Nevertheless, tight money policy, as represented by high interest rates, remains, and the minimum lending rate stands at 12 per cent.

What of tax reductions? Some people have certainly benefited but, in 1978-79, tax receipts took 33·7 per cent. of gross domestic product whereas this year they will take 38 per cent. What makes this failure to reduce taxation all the more astonishing is the fact that the Chancellor, thanks to North sea oil, has received an additional £57 billion in revenue and a further £10 billion from the sale of public assets.

What of public expenditure, the last of the pillars which would sustain the new economy? In 1978-79, public expenditure took 42·3 per cent. of gross domestic product. This year, the estimated outcome is 42·8 per cent. of GDP. Unhappily for Britain, the past seven years were not just a story of an intellectually arrogant Chancellor who got both the theory and the practice of macro-economics wrong and who has had to eat his own words and swallow his own Red Books; it is also the story of seven years of havoc, destruction and misery for thousands of firms and millions of people.

As hon. Member after hon. Member today and yesterday have observed, there is, alas, nothing in the Queen's Speech which deals with the three crucial problems of the British economy — the level of unemployment, the decline in manufacturing industry and the growing crisis in our balance of payments. In spite of the much trumpeted fall in last month's figures—oh yes, we welcome that—in October 1986, for the seventh year running, the seasonally adjusted level of unemployment is higher than it was one year ago. It was 47,000 higher in October 1986 than it was in October last year.

Even with the Government's heavily doctored figures, unemployment now stands at 3,168,000 — or 11·5 per cent. of the working population. That is a far higher figure than in any comparable industrial nation. Nor is there any sign of real improvement other than the reduction in figures that may result from the redefinitions — they occur month after month — of the number of people who are unemployed.

The autumn statement postulates, for national insurance purposes, 3,100,000 unemployed for 1986-87 and 3,050,000 unemployed for 1987-88. In the regional development submissions to the EEC this year, as my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, the Government's estimate of unemployment is still above 3 million in 1990.

We must consider the sorry plight of Britain's manufacturing industry. We heard the Prime Minister's defence last Wednesday. She claimed that manufacturing output had risen since the 1983 election and that manufacturing investment had increased last year. Listening to the Prime Minister, as I have listened to other Ministers during the past few days, I was reminded of a slim volume that appeared some years ago, entitled "How to Lie with Statistics". One of the crucial things is carefully to select the base year. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that she came to power not in 1983 but in 1979. The plain fact is that manufacturing output is still eight points lower this year than it was when her party came to power. Further, investment in manufacturing industry is over 17 per cent. down on what it was in 1979.

As for investment in manufacturing industry being up last year, the Prime Minister omitted to tell us that the figures for this year show that it has fallen again below the 1985 level. As for manufacturing export volumes being at record levels, the right hon. Lady knows full well that manufacturing imports are at still higher levels. Indeed, the contrast is shown very clearly in a written answer of 6 May 1986. Taking 1980 as a base at 100, our volume of exports went up in the first quarter of 1986 to 102·6, whereas the figure in the import column had risen to 142·4. There have been some minor changes since then, but the broad orders of magnitude remain.

As for the past four years, as the House knows, for the first time since we recorded trade flows in this country, Britain has become a net importer of manufactured goods. Indeed, in exactly six years, we have moved from a surplus of £5 billion in manufacturing trade to a deficit of £5 billion this year. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry boasted yesterday, as did the Chancellor today, about the productivity gains that manufacturing industry has made. But the plain fact is that our competitors have also had productivity gains, and, in their case, backed up with far larger capital investment than British firms have been able to undertake. What matters is our relative strength — our international competitiveness. Here, the story is dismal indeed.

In the first quarter of 1986 — according to the last available IMF figures — as compared with the first quarter of 1979, we were 30 per cent. less competitive. Of course, there has been some improvement since the first quarter of 1986 simply because we have devalued by some 10 per cent. against the international basket of currencies. But, allowing for this, we are still some 20 per cent. less competitive today than we were in the spring of 1979. It is no wonder that our trade deficit in manufactured goods has grown and will continue to grow.

The enthusiasts in favour of joining the EMS had better think very carefully about the full implications for a country which has not yet succeeded in establishing competitiveness and sustained growth, of being locked into an exchange rate mechanism which would inflict German disciplines and German competitiveness upon the British economy.

The third point I wish to make relates to the balance of payments. This year, 1986-87, despite our total self-sufficiency in oil and our net exports of some £6 billion of oil, we shall, according to the Government's autumn statement, be in balance of payments current account deficit to the tune of £1·5 billion. The Government carefully do not look beyond 1987, but the House will recall the IMF's world economic outlook report, which was published at the end of September this year. It looked to 1991, and said:

"The position of the UK is projected to shift from a small surplus in 1986 to a sizeable deficit."

The House will recall the report of last year's Select Committee in the other place on Britain's overseas trade. It, too, looked to 1990. On the assumption that we shall still be in balance on our oil trade by that date, it predicted that on present trends there would be a current account deficit that would amount to no less than £13 billion.

For sheer, breathtaking optimism I do not think that I have ever read a statement that quite compares with what the Secretary for Trade and Industry told us yesterday:

"My right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out the effect of that extremely clearly in his autumn statement. I have every confidence that we shall soon move back into surplus when the exchange rate and everything else has adapted to deal with the new circumstances. I have no qualms about the future course of the balance of payments."—[Official Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 469.]

It is amazing that any responsible, senior economic Minister should dare to say that in the House in this autumn of 1986. It was an extraordinary statement.

It is not just national economic failure for which we indict the Government. The Queen's Speech is bereft of proposals for dealing with the great divisions that have opened up in British society. The Government have been remarkably coy about publishing the figures relating to the increase in poverty in the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, thanks to the industry and persistence of my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the DHSS slipped the figures for 1983 into the summer recess. They show that the number of people living on, or below, the supplementary benefit level has increased from 5·9 million in 1979 to 8·8 million in 1983. On very conservative estimates, the 1983 total will have reached the 10 million mark this year. That is an appalling figure, and means nearly one in five of our total population.

What a contrast can be made with those at the other end of the scale. According to the Inland Revenue's statistics, there were roughly 1,000 individuals in the United Kingdom in 1978 with personal assets of more than £1 million. In 1983, there were 7,000 people with such assets, and there were no fewer than 11,000 people with assets of over £1 million in 1984. That was all before the big bang opened up the prospect of very major gains in personal wealth.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Shore: I listened to the hon. Gentleman. I understood his point, but I do not accept that analysis. When he looks more carefully into the matter, I think that he will find that the figures do not bear that out.

The ever-growing gulf between north and south is the second major problem that I wish to touch on. I am glad that the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) stressed the importance of regional imbalance. Of course, 11·5 per cent. is the national average for unemployment. But in the west midlands, Yorkshire Humberside, the north-west, Scotland and Wales, unemployment stands at between 13 and 14 per cent. In the northern region, it stands at 16 per cent. For the south-east and East Anglia the figures are 8·4 per cent. and 8·7 per cent. respectively.

Regional policy has in the past seven years virtually collapsed. The industrial development certificates have been abolished, assisted areas greatly reduced in size and the value of grants and tax allowances greatly reduced. In so far as we have a regional policy, it is no longer to bring work to unemployed workers but that workers have to migrate to wherever the jobs are. That is the "get on your bike" philosophy so vividly prescribed by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

However, that retrograde policy is up against three major obstacles. First, the structure plans of the county councils in the south-east and south-west simply do not permit the necessary land for housebuilding to be made available. Secondly, even where the land is available, massive reduction in house building ensures a chronic housing shortage, particularly of housing to let in the greater part of southern England. Thirdly, as a consequence of the shortage of land and houses, the price of houses in the London area and the commuter districts has soared. A semi-detached house of similar quality costs two to three times more in London and the commuter areas around our capital city than in the midlands, the north, the north-west, Wales or Scotland.

As people must have homes in order to work, we now have the absurd position of actual labour shortages in parts of the south-east. People are able and willing to do the work, but as they are unable to find accommodation they are forced to stay put in the north. The third of our social divisions which has been vastly accentuated is the concentration of poverty and unemployment in the inner cities of our major conurbations. The Government have never challenged the special partnership status that the previous Labour Government accorded to the seven most deprived inner-city areas of Britain. Yet they have taken away from precisely those areas through cuts in the housing investment programme and rate support grant cuts to the tune of £900 million a year. The final irony is that following this year's rate support grant order, no fewer than nine of the 14 district councils that are acknowledged to have the greatest need, have been rate-capped for alleged overspending.

The prospect for our society after seven years of unrestrained Thatcherism is grim indeed. It is against that background of social crisis and economic failure that we have to judge this year's Queen's Speech. What have the Government to say about all these economic and social problems? They say just two things. First:

"My Government's firm monetary and fiscal policies will continue to restrain inflation and foster the conditions necessary for further sustained economic growth."

Secondly, they say:

"My Government will maintain firm control of public expenditure, so that it may continue to fall as a proportion of the Nation's income and permit further reductions in the burden of taxation."

That is hardly a clarion call.

A week last Monday at the Lord Mayor's banquet, the Prime Minister noted the city's memorial to William Pitt the Younger, and quoted the following lines:

"He repaired the exhausted revenue; he revived and "invigorated the commerce and prosperity of the country; he re-established the public credit on deep and sure foundations."

The Prime Minister went on to say:

"I would like to think that the same will be said of this Government."

It will not be said of this Government. Rather, it will be said that the Prime Minister and her Cabinet squandered the greatest opportunity—the vast output of North sea oil—that any British Government have had this century; that they have piled taxes and burdens upon the people and squandered the great public assets that successive Governments have built up since the war; that they have brought poverty and unemployment to millions of our fellow countrymen; and that they have divided the country afresh, rich and poor, north and south. They are, in sum, a Government unworthy of the people whom they claim to represent.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): This debate began one week ago with distinguished speeches from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris). Both contributions had a lightness of touch which launched the debate in a happy manner. The House will be the poorer without my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham after the next election.

Mr. Kinnock: He is leaving the sinking ship.

Mr. Biffen: The Leader of the Opposition should not start prattling about sinking ships.

Mr. Kinnock: I was simply pointing out, in the same felicitous tone as the Leader of the House, that the departure of the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) and of the Conservative Government will be one of the few instances in history in which the ship sank because it got lighter.

Mr. Biffen: The House will have the rest of the Session to work out that convoluted humour. It will also console itself with the continuing membership of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East as he converts that area into a bastion of Toryism.

The debate on the Address has frequently been the occasion for the House to welcome maiden speeches. On this occasion there have been no maiden speeches, but we were in the unusual position of seeing a new Member introduced during the course of the debate. I am sure that the House will wish to join me in welcoming the new Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth). It is not for me to intrude into the local difficulties of the Labour party on Merseyside, but I believe that the hon. Gentleman is the standard bearer of authentic Socialism—I can think of no more wounding comment than that.

The Queen's Speech and the debate on the Humble Address are essentially traditional occasions. Although the subjects chosen for each day's debate vary from year to year, it is customary for the Leader of the House to wind up the whole debate. On this occasion, although speaking traditionally, I propose to introduce an innovation by giving the House some modest but early guidance about the expected dates of the Easter recess. [Interruption.] There seems to be greater alertness about this than about the size of the public sector borrowing requirement. The innovation arises because of the late timing of Easter and I appreciate that for political and other reasons Members would like to know the Government's intentions. I can tell the House that it is our intention that the Easter recess should largely precede rather than, as is customary, follow Easter day. The exact dates will, of course, be subject to the progress of business.

In the present climate of speculation about the date of the general election, the announcement of any date, however anodyne, causes acute fever among election spotters. Nor is it merely the announcement of dates which serves to fuel the speculation — on this occasion the contents of the Queen's Speech itself have been seen by some as raising the temperature of election fever. As a business manager, I strongly contest the view of those who see the programme outlined in the Queen's Speech as "disposable" and "throwaway". I believe that serious consideration of the measures contained in it show it to be a programme which will properly engage the parliamentary resources of the Session. In that context, I was delighted at the wholly unrehearsed intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) earlier today when he arrived, like one bringing the good news from Ghent or wherever in more poetic circumstances, to assure the House that there would not be an early election.

I have noticed a particular nervousness on the Opposition Benches. All the talk, frenzied chatter, neurosis and advice, especially from the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who said we should cut and get the beastly business over, as if the prisoner found himself in the condemned cell without even a packet of razor blades, is to be contrasted with the quiet confidence of the Conservative Members, who know that we are here to carry out a task for the Session.

The Queen's Speech refers to 19 measures but the full programme, of course, is more extensive than those measures mentioned specifically. Last Session we introduced 34 Bills, and I do not expect this Session's programme to fall far short of that total.

As I suggested earlier, there has been comment that this Session's programme is lacking in substance and contentiousness. To rebut that, I need do no more than draw the House's attention to a few of the Bills which will be before us in the forthcoming months. They underline the priorities of the Government.

Among the most important must be the Criminal Justice Bill. Its provisions support our determination to uphold the protective role of law, without which no social order can survive. In particular, the Bill contains wide powers for the confiscation of the proceeds of profitable crime, measures for tackling fraud and provisions to improve the position of the victims of crime.

Secondly, I refer to the Consumer Protection Bill which we introduced yesterday in another place. That represents a major gain for consumers, especially in terms of safety. In particular it will ensure that consumers can more readily secure compensation for personal injuries caused by defective products, and will require suppliers to ensure the safety of all consumer goods, not just those covered by specific safety regulations. It will also give consumers greater protection from misleading price indications such as bogus "bargain offers". Furthermore, it should ease trade within the European Community through similar national product liability laws. I believe that it will be widely welcomed.

Finally, I draw the House's attention to the Bill which is designed to replace rates with a community charge as the basis for local authority finance in Scotland. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has said that that Bill will soon be presented to the House, and furthermore its general contents have been widely anticipated. I accept at once that that is a contentious matter, but at long last the acute problems of local authority finance are being converted from academic and armchair analysis to the testing house of political debate and decision.

I shall now refer to some of the more general issues that have featured in the debate, not only this afternoon but through the several days that have preceded it. There are two topics on which I think the House would wish to reflect, if Opposition Members are so benign as to reflect at this stage of the debate. The first is defence and the second is the economy.

As ever, my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had some harsh things to say about party conferences, with which I wholly concur. From time to time it is difficult to avoid them and it is even possible that they do have some significance. Therefore, I feel that I have to pay some regard to the party conference of the Labour party at Blackpool this year when decisions were taken to decommission Polaris, for the immediate cancellation of Trident and for the removal of United States nuclear bases from Britain. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is so nice to know that the party conference decisions are now being echoed to the rafters in this Chamber.

The first and most charitable thing that one can say about those decisions is that they set out the long-standing hostility of some Labour Members to nuclear weapons in any case. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful for the confirmation. Secondly, they demonstrate the significance and influence of neutralists within the Labour party. What we are now seeing, not in any crisp or concise evolution, is the drift towards a sort of undefended fortress Britain.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) was kind enough to refer to the younger Pitt in his speech. He had not acquainted me with his intention of doing so. I do not object, but I am rather pleased because I also have a quotation from the younger Pitt, which is apposite. At this stage of the 20th century, this country exercises, in the world at large, only a modest amount of direct authority. It exercises influence through the network of alliances to which it assigns itself. What is now proposed has to be tested against Pitt's observation:

> "England has saved herself by her exertions, and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example."

What do we suppose will be the influence of that conference defence decision on the other countries with whom we are neighbours and close allies? What will be the impact? What will be the influence on the Federal Republic of Germany? Is it not just the type of decision that will sustain the strong anti-nuclear sentiments of the SPD—the Social Democratic party—in Germany, which is committed to the withdrawal of all nuclear weapons from German soil? Is not that just the sort of boost that it would wish from a major partner in NATO?

What will be the impact in France, which for decades has had merely an arm's-length relationship with many of its NATO commitments? Is not that the sort of decision that will reinforce that French ambiguity about its membership of NATO? Finally, what will be the influence exerted in the United States? Is it not precisely the decision that will confirm the views of isolationists and others in the United States, who would rather deal direct with the Soviet Union than have any regard for the European aspect of the NATO partnership? Make no mistake, what was decided at Blackpool was a dangerous leap into the dark. It is much more about neutralism than about recasting the NATO Alliance. The electorate will have their opportunity to make their judgment. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Once again, we are delighted to know from the applause of Opposition Members that they want this matter to be at the forefront as and when the popular decision comes.

I now come to economic affairs. [Laughter.] I can understand the nervousness of those on Opposition Benches, but it is clear that that is a major matter for the House as it surveys the Session ahead. I suspect that there will be an amplitude of economic debate, even outside the situations specifically provided for in the Queen's Speech. Today's debate will take forward the broad strategy of the Treasury Bench and the Conservative party to promote a social market economy, the key feature of which is monetary stability, a spread of ownership and institutional reform. As those factors will detain us during the coming Session, I shall say a quick word about each.

The central feature of the Government's economic policy must be the tremendous success in bringing down the rate of inflation to where it now stands at 3 per cent. That remains the continuing objective, and this afternoon my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it more than abundantly clear that in no sense does the autumn statement and the public spending proposals therein contained infringe or undermine that objective. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said:

> "The Government's fiscal stance has been clearly set out in the medium-term financial strategy published at the time of this year's Budget. There will be no relaxation of that stance."—[Official Report, 6 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 1084.]

Those who care to read this afternoon's debate will know that it is accepted that inflation has a consequence for tax policy. The Government are determined to place the integrity of an inflation policy ahead of any other short-term considerations that might have attracted others—such as in the 1974 Budget, I recollect, when the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) had the most contrived reduction of value added tax — the most cynical piece of statistical dressing that this country has ever suffered.

The other point which is also clear is that the policy of stable prices, and the evident success that is represented by today's inflation figure of around 3 per cent., is now being partnered by a growing record of sustained economic growth. For those who disparage the figure because it is but 3 per cent., the truth is that that is very much a good performance given the historical standards of Britain—a point which was made well by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo).

The other desperately miserable and demoralising news for the Opposition Benches is that now there appears to be the likelihood of a new trend in the employment figures. For the past three months the average fall has been 19,000. The unfilled vacancies, a figure that cannot conceivably have been affected by the changes in the count, now stand at 213,000—the highest figure for seven years. We shall look forward to continuing debates about this and related subjects in the months that lie ahead.

Let me deal with the second aspect of the social market economy as it is now being developed by the Conservative party and the Government. I refer to the spread in ownership which was referred to as — we shall never know the context, but those in the Chamber, as I was, will have heard the description — immoral when describing the policies of privatisation and the wider spread of possession that goes with it. That is not just a question of shares that have hitherto been in state-owned activities; there are 2 million more home owners now than there were in 1979, 1 million of whom are accounted for by the switch from local authority ownership to home ownership.

We have had an ambitious privatisation programme which has been highly successful. There has been awakened a public interest in the concept of share owning which is immensely disagreeable for the Opposition Benches because they know that at the end of the day popular ownership in Britain's assets lies uneasily with their concepts of Socialism and centralism.

Twelve per cent. of the adult population are now share owners and after the next Parliament — I speak in anticipation of a future Queen's Speech — there will be every intention to take that ahead with further privatisation and an increase in the imaginative tax plans that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has developed to encourage a popular basis of ownership in Britain.

My third point relates to the reform of institutions. Reference was made to that this afternoon. In this Parliament there has been major trade union reform—a measure which has received wide acclamation on the Conservative Benches. There have been few hesitations about the primacy of that programme.

Leaving aside the libertarian arguments, which are substantial and meritorious, we see strikes at their lowest level for about 50 years. The message that the House must convey to the wider public has to do with whether that institutional reform is to stand or whether it will be challenged in any effective sense by the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend will accept that we already know the threat posed to that legislation by the Labour party. Is he able to understand at all the different strands on it in the alliance, and from his readings of alliance policies, can he say how much the alliance threatens that legislation?

Mr. Biffen: That shows the great merit of having a Queen's Speech and a parliamentary Session in which such matters can be further canvassed because they cannot be canvassed during the interstices of my peroration this evening. But I agree with my hon. Friend.

There remains also the question of other areas of major institutional reform, and here I echo the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) when he said that education is an area in which there could now be a major development. I am certain that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will be anxious to build upon the Education Act 1986, which has given a sign already of the importance that we attach to strengthening the school as a major point of decision in the education process. I think that there will be great encouragement from the development of the city technology colleges, which is an attempt to bring innovation and a return of the sense of excellence to our education system. When it comes to further reforms, my right hon. Friend will be looking round and about to gain inspiration. Perhaps I could do no better than to quote the spokesman of the Council of Local Education Authorities in the February 1985 edition of "Education". He said:

"We now have irrefutable evidence of the Burnham Committee's inadequacy in resolving the current problems of pay and conditions of service."

These are all areas that will be available for the House to debate in the Session that will unroll and reflect the Queen's Speech. The Queen's Speech outlines policies that will sustain and extend the social market economy that was initiated in 1979. That approach to our national afairs will be subject to sustained debate in this place and in another place over the coming months, and that debate will not be only for the self-appointed elitists of Westminster and Whitehall and the quality end of Fleet street. The debate is intended for popular judgment and endorsement, and that is what causes anxieties on the Opposition Benches.

The two sides of the House are divided by much more than a carpeted strip. Labour Members, no less than Liberals and Social Democrats, have a series of common beliefs in the conduct of economic policies. They believe in substantially higher public spending, that would be partly matched by higher taxes and partly by greater borrowing. They believe in greater Whitehall regulation and control of the economy. The scope is considerable, ranging from the political direction of pension funds to a tentative revival of price and incomes policies. The right hon. Member for Devonport, the leader of the Social Democratic party, helpfully reminded the House of how significant all that could be if his party were to have some decisive say.

This is a rehabilitation of the policies of Labour Governments of the mid-1960s and late 1970s. Those were the policies that were cheerfully and jointly undertaken by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and by Mrs. Shirley Williams, the dream ticket of yesteryear. I have no doubt that there is, even now, a Lib-Lab common sympathy that could sustain these policies should the parliamentary situation require it. It is the determination of the Government side of the House, however, that the Leader of the Opposition should not be elected to this Treasury Bench, whether or not he receives the support of the Liberals and Social Democrats.

The present economic policies of the Opposition look back to the 1970s, back to the inflation of those years and the imposed advice of the International Monetary Fund. That is the most unproductive form of nostalgia. The Opposition's defence policies are a gamble and no more than the uncertain wisdoms of a Labour party conference. A nation's security deserves more than that.

The Queen's Speech—[Interruption.] I am sorry that it is so wounding for Opposition Members as the field is drawn out across which we shall debate the content of the Queen's Speech during the coming Session, but I want them to be under no misapprehension. We intend to carry this programme through to its conclusion. It is a constructive Queen's Speech and it happens to serve the admirable task of enabling the House in its debates, arguments and postures to show to the world outside, and in advance, just what is at stake at the next general election. Whether that is in terms of defence or an effective economic policy, we shall look forward to the test, will relish the challenge, and will respect the verdict.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendment proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 32 (Calling of amendments at end of debate), at the end of the Question to add:

But humbly regret that the Gracious Speech is irrelevant to the country's most pressing problems: unemployment, poverty, falling standards in the health and social services, and the serious decline in British manufacturing industry; believe that present Government policies have generated a short-term pre-election consumer boom, and that record levels of real interest rates and rising unit costs are undermining Britain's competitiveness; call on the Government to enter the exchange rate mechanism of the European Monetary System, to adopt a more vigorous competition policy, and substantially to increase investment in skill training; further regret the inclusion in the Speech of a measure to replace domestic rates in Scotland with a regressive poll tax rather than a more equitable local income tax; and finally regret that, in what is likely to be the last Gracious Speech before the general election, there is no proposal to reform the electoral system for local, Westminster and European elections despite the deficiencies in the current system, which distorts the wishes of the people and produces divisive governments supported by only a minority of the electorate.—[Dr. Owen]

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

To be presented by Privy Councillors or Members of Her Majesty's Household.

Disabled People (Employment)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ryder.]

10.41 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I want to raise a matter that has been a subject for debate for some time—namely, the need for anti-discrimination legislation to cover the needs of disabled people. Attempts have been made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) and the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) to introduce such legislation.

On 18 November 1983 I introduced a private Member's Bill. That date will go down as a day of shame for the House of Commons, because of the way in which that Bill was defeated by the manoeuverings of the Government, who undoubtedly imposed an unofficial Whip. I remind the House that Ministers cancelled their engagements to rush to the House to defeat a Bill that was intended to assist disabled people. As an aside, as this debate affects the disabled I must put on record that it is appalling that the Minister with responsibility for the disabled is not here to reply to the debate.

During the debate on my Bill, I referred to many examples of discrimination in employment against disabled people. For example, I mentioned mentally handicapped people who went to a local jobcentre looking for work, only to be told by the manager that they should not even be in the jobcentre. I also cited the case of an engineer who made 40 applications for jobs, in which he mentioned that he was confined to a wheelchair. He did not receive a single offer of a job interview.

I referred to many other cases of discrimination, many of them in employment. For example, a well qualified paraplegic submitted 50 applications for jobs in which he mentioned his disability, and received only one interview. When he made a further 35 applications, not mentioning his disability, he received 12 invitations for interview. There are many such cases.

All the cases that have been cited in the House from time to time have been anecdotal evidence, but that has now been supplemented by a statistical report by The Spastics Society entitled "An Equal Chance for Disabled People? A Study of Discrimination in Employment". It shows that, without doubt, there is wholesale discrimination against disabled people seeking employment.

Those who carried out the survey upon which the report was based answered 152 advertisements for secretarial jobs. They submitted two applications by similarly qualified people for each job, except that in one case the applicant mentioned having a disability. In 59 cases, both the able-bodied and the disabled applicants received a negative response. The remaining 93 cases proved to be a valid testimony to discrimination against the disabled. In 38 instances, only the disabled applicant received a negative response — 41 per cent. of applications. That compares with only three instances of able-bodied applicants being refused—about 3 per cent. of applications.

The disabled who received a negative reply normally received no reply. In those that they did receive, all manner of excuses were offered. For example, one reply stated that the applicant's qualifications and experience were not what was required—yet the able-bodied applicant with similar qualifications was offered an interview. Another excuse was that the post had already been filled—yet again the able-bodied applicant was offered an interview. In one case the disabled applicant received a letter saying that the temporary secretary had decided to become permanent—yet the able-bodied applicant was offered an interview. Even in one of the positive responses to a disabled applicant there were words of discouragement —"Don't forget, if you work for us you will be working in premises akin to a lighthouse."

Since 1944, legislation has been on the statute book entitling the disabled to special consideration in employment—a quota of 3 per cent. However, about 70 per cent. of firms do not adhere to that. Indeed, not a single Government Department adheres to the quota that Parliament decided way back in 1944 was advisable.

Far from encouraging the employment of disabled people, the Government have tended to do the reverse. In 1984, the Manpower Services Commission issued 18,700 permits exempting employers from the quota obligations. I remind the House that the quota in this country is small in comparison with other countries. West Germany, for example, has a quota of 6 per cent., and if employers do not adhere to it they are levied and the funds used for the rehabilitation of handicapped people. In this country, after 40 years, the total fines imposed for contravention of the 1944 Act in this respect amount to less than £1,000 and there have been only 10 prosecutions. That must bring a wry smile to the faces of councillors in my home town of Liverpool who are prosecuted by the unelected district auditor merely for trying to carry out their election promises.

In the spring of 1985 a labour force survey showed that 412,000 or 23·4 per cent. of economically active disabled people in this country were unemployed. That is twice the national average for unemployment generally.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is my hon. Friend aware of the letter sent to the Paymaster General on 7 November by the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation about the trap in which the association believes that disabled people would be ensnared by the new availability-for-work test announced by the Government? RADAR expresses the fear that under the new guidelines many unemployed disabled people would qualify neither for unemployment benefit nor for invalidity benefit and would be dumped in the queue for supplementary benefit, which would pile handicap upon handicap for those concerned.

Mr. Wareing: I am obliged to my right hon. Friend. I have received a copy of that letter from RADAR, which clearly shows that under the new work test many people will fall between two stools and end up without invalidity benefit or unemployment benefit. This debate gives the Minister the opportunity to answer RADAR on that point.

Some employers, however, have been doing their best to provide work for disabled people. The much abused Labour-controlled Lambeth borough council has done a great deal for disabled people. In May this year out of a work force of 10,000 the council employed only about 90 disabled people or 0·9 per cent. of the work force. Five months later, the 3 per cent. quota had been reached and by November the council was employing about 400 disabled people or 4 per cent. of the total work force.

Lambeth has shown what can be done, given the political will, but every discussion in this Parliament since 1983 about legislation, benefits and employment for disabled people has shown that the Government lack that political will. When my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) introduced his Bill it was clear that although the Government might have let the Bill through they would seek every possible means of ensuring that the funding was not available for local authorities.

The problems of employment for disabled people go far wider than merely finding jobs and, indeed, wider than the ambit of the Minister. There is the question of education and training for handicapped people in our society. The Bill that I introduced was aimed at abolishing discrimination and enabling disabled people, be they blind, deaf or in a wheelchair, to go into colleges of further education and training establishments. All of those features are essential if disabled people are not to be further disadvantaged than their disability. They are able to take up the possibility of jobs. The survey of The Spastics Society has shown us just the tip of the iceberg of discrimination in one area; employment. However, it has shown that the widening of horizons can be there for disabled people if the Government are willing to act on the report, which is firmly in favour of anti-discrimination legislation.

During the debate on my Bill the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) said:

"For the hon. Gentleman to prove his case, he would have to show that there was discrimination, and not merely ignorance, lack of understanding or insensitivity, which we all agree exists in abundance and is directed towards people in all categories. The hon. Gentleman would also have to show that such discrimination existed on a scale that justified the very complex machinery that he proposes." — [Official Report, 18 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 126.]

I suggest that that evidence is there now and it requires careful reading by the Under-Secretary of State and by other Ministers. If they were honest, they would say to the House that the Bill I proposed three years ago almost to this very day, on 18 November 1983, is very much required and that they will make haste to see that it reaches the statute book.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. John Lee): First, let me congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on having secured this Adjournment debate. We all know of his genuine, deep and long-standing commitment to the interests of disabled people. I am also pleased to see some other right hon. and hon. Members in their places, including my ministerial colleague, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), who is also interested in this area.

May I say to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Norris) that I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General will be responding to the letter from the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation and I will see that he gets a copy of the letter.

Mr. Alfred Morris: RADAR's letter was dated 7 November. I had a parliamentary answer on 17 November from the Paymaster General in which he said:

"I have received no representations on the effect of the new guidelines on disabled people." — [Official Report, 17 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 66.]

That is palpably untrue. It was 10 days after strong representations had been made to him. Will the Minister apologise for his right hon. and learned Friend's parliamentary reply to me and now respond to RADAR's letter?

Mr. Lee: With the greatest respect, this has just been sprung on me. The right hon. Gentleman knows the traditions of Adjournment debates. I did give way. I certainly cannot apologise, because I do not know the circumstances. However, I will look into the case and we will respond.

The disabled in the community are a group to whose concerns the Government pay particular regard and for whom we have a very wide range of special provisions. Theirs is a cause which attracts, I am sure, the genuine and united concern of everyone in the House. I am grateful, therefore, for the opportunity to debate this extremely important issue, and want to stress at the outset our resolve to maintain, and where possible improve, that support.

The Government follow earlier Administrations in continuing to base their provision very firmly on the principles set out by George Tomlinson when he was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour over 40 years ago, and which form the basis of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944. We are all indebted to his Committee, which had the vision to realise that society not only had a moral duty to help the disabled but that we should harness to the full the abilities and commitment of disabled people. That model has served this nation well. Times have changed, and the employment situation has changed, but the basis of Government policy remains unchanged. The disabled have a full and valuable role to play in the work force.

That belief continues to be relevant for the future. The back-breaking toil on which our first industrial revolution was built is being replaced by the new technology revolution. This demands other skills — use of intelligence, flexibility, the ability to find new ways around unforeseen problems. Who can have demonstrated these skills better than people who have overcome their own handicaps? Employers wondering how to find employees who can cope with the future would do well to remember that many people with disabilities have already shown that they can cope with the worst that nature can throw at them.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Lee: I am sorry, but I must plough on.

New technology is also opening up opportunities for employment. More people who might have been considered unemployable can now work. More disabled people currently in menial jobs can now realise their full potential. Let us also not forget the special benefits which people who are disabled have always brought employers. Who can measure the benefits of such things as the unique loyalty that they show an employer who has given them a chance?

Indeed, there is surprisingly little that people with disabilities cannot do, given the chance. I am sure that the hon. Member for West Derby and I are at one on that. Giving them that chance is the theme that runs through Government policy. Our symbol of the gateway to the labour market is the half-open "action for jobs" doorway.

[Mr. Lee]

People with disabilities may need a little extra help to push that door open. Government policy is rather like the wedge which prevents the door from being shut in the face of the disabled population, but to push the door wide open, we work with the full efforts and co-operation of the community at large — local authorities, employers, organisations for, and of, people with disabilities. I should like, if I may, to take a few moments to expand on that.

This Adjournment debate comes at a time when more opportunities than ever before are being given to the disabled to work on their merits in ordinary employment. As part of the growth in the youth training scheme, the Manpower Services Commission has introduced a wide range of special help to encourage eligible young people with disabilities to enter the scheme. This includes delayed entry, extension of stay, assessment courses and special help such as adaptation to premises and communication aids for deaf people.

On adult training, our aim is that people with disabilities should obtain a fair share of training provision. Where possible, they should participate fully in mainstream training programmes and there are relaxed eligibility criteria to enable them to do this. Besides mainstream provision, the MSC offers an extensive range of special training provision for people with disabilities including individually tailored training programmes with an employer, residential training, and the professional training scheme.

Some conditions also are waived to allow the disabled to take part fully in the community programme. At jobcentres, disablement resettlement officers continue to show the commitment which is the cornerstone of our success in this area—and it is a success. Last year, over 77,000 disabled people were placed into employment through MSC services—more than ever before. A cause for optimism, yes—but this year we intend to do even better than that.

Last year was also a record year for levels of take-up and expenditure on special programmes. At employment rehabilitation centres, for instance, over 13,000 people were assessed and given counselling and guidance towards the type of work or further training most likely to lead to a permanent job. Employment rehabilitation centres and the three new pilot ASSET centres are beginning to turn from the traditional emphasis on manual work to assessment and training for service industries and new technology. I welcome that development, as, I believe, do disabled people themselves.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the Minister give way on this point?

Mr. Lee: I am under some pressure.

Mr. Carter-Jones: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. We talked about 1944 and 1986. Will the Minister undertake now, or at a future meeting with me and my colleagues, to discuss the application of advanced technology to enable severely handicapped people to play a role in our society? That has been left out of the reckoning so far.

Mr. Lee: Yes, I take the point. I shall be more than happy to see the hon. Gentleman at a mutually convenient time. I know of his genuinely sincere conviction and commitment to this area.

Over £1 million was spent providing specialist equipment to meet the varying needs of individual disabled employees. This is not merely accommodating desks and chairs but a harnessing of new technology to serve the disabled — to enable the deaf to use the ordinary telephone network through a visual display of the message transmitted, or to enable the blind to use computers by replacing the visual display with a speech output facility. Expenditure continues to rise also for adaptation to premises, our job introduction scheme, assistance with fares to work and the personal reader service for the blind. In all, last year there were nearly 5,000 beneficiaries—that is nearly 5,000 more disabled people who were able to keep their jobs thanks to the individual benefits of these schemes.

This year is also something of a milestone—in two separate ways—for the help given to those disabled people who are just not able to compete on the open labour market. First, Remploy is celebrating 40 years of meeting the sheltered employment needs of the disabled. When Remploy was formed as the then Disabled Persons Employment Corporation Ltd, it led the rest of Europe as the first of its kind. The Government are still proud to be part of that venture. Remploy's work has increasingly been not just a boon to its employees but a commercial achievement, marketing and selling its wide range of quality goods and services. Through Remploy, and the rest of the sheltered employment programme, some 16,400 people with severe disabilities enjoy the independence, self-esteem and social standing which securing a job means. A fortnight ago I saw for myself at the SELMEC local authority workshop in Old Trafford the energy and enthusiasm of the work force which this measure brings.

Our continuing aim is to broaden the range of work opportunities available for disabled people. Flexibility of provision is vital in such a policy. The Government recognise that, while some severely disabled people find that sheltered workshops best meet their employment needs, those that are able want to work in a normal working environment alongside their able-bodied colleagues. What is more, they want to get the rate for the job, not because of some statute that requires employers to take them on but because society recognises their abilities and does not just consider their disability.

Everyone in this House must therefore welcome the fact that the ideal of fuller integration of the disabled within the working community is being met through the sheltered placement scheme. This is the message I received when I saw it in action recently in Scunthorpe.

That the sheltered placement scheme has commanded widespread support is clear from the scale of its recent development. Last year, 1985-86, the number of people employed under the scheme almost doubled — from around 1,050 to over 1,800. The planned expansion this year, with over 1,000 new places, will mean that nearly 3,000 severely disabled people will soon be employed under the scheme, and we intend a further substantial expansion. One factor perhaps stands out here. The sheltered placement scheme is an initiative which recognises explicitly that a severely disabled person cannot contribute to the productivity of the firm on level terms with fully fit colleagues. We therefore say to the employer, "You pay for the person's ability and we will pay for the disability." That is a simple enough concept, perhaps, but it seems to work.

I trust that these examples demonstrate that there is much Government help available for people with disabilities. This year we aim to spend some £130 million, which is more than ever before. But we cannot be expected to do all this alone. The Government always value the contribution of the disabled lobby. Representatives from voluntary organisations, the CBI and TUC meet on the National Advisory Council on Employment of Disabled People to give advice—indeed, this council is at present reviewing some of the Tomlinson principles. I understand that it has produced a paper for wider consultation, and I look forward to receiving its views in due course.

I spoke earlier about the importance of working as a team to push wide open the doorway to jobs. The way to win the real benefits of integration is to secure the good will and co-operation of employers and not to impose an ever greater burden of legislation upon them. Indeed, it was in this spirit of partnership that the Prime Minister launched the code of good practice on the employment of disabled people in November 1984. Once again I am proud to say that we led the way in Europe on this, providing guidelines. Drawn up with the help and wholehearted support of the CBI TUC and disabled organisations, on how the disabled can take their place in normal employment.

I am delighted that 72,000 copies of the code are now held by employers, helping them to help all of us. The MSC's disablement advisory service teams—themselves a fairly recent, and successful, innovation—continue to promote it enthusiastically. I was able to share the message of the code of good practice and the excellent complementary video "It Worked Fine" with 120 local employers at a seminar at Reading earlier this month. The theme of that day was giving the disabled the chance to show what they can do. We are helping to make this a reality with imagination and vigour, and I am determined to continue to do so.

Encouragement of the code will continue to complement the existing statutory provision, but it is not intended as a replacement for it. Of course, there are problems in the existing system of registration and application of the statutory quota. As is well known, numbers of registered disabled have fallen since the war to the point where it is impossible for all employers subject to quota to take on their 3 per cent. It was an acknowledgement of this problem—following a thorough review by the MSC and involving interest parties — that led us to ask the commission to conduct a major, comprehensive research exercise into the numbers and characteristics of disabled people in the work force, and their attitudes and those of their employers to the quota. The results, in just over a year's time, of this exercise should enable all of us to consider the proper need for quota provision, and protect us from wild and uninformed claims.

The European Community has recognised our lead in provision for disabled people. In its recent recommendation of measures to promote fair employment and training opportunities based on eliminating negative discrimination, it explicitly endorsed our code of good practice. The Government, of course, welcome this Communitywide commitment and will continue to work in full co-operation with other member states to secure employment and training for our disabled people.

The code is voluntary and its success is based on the partnership of interests. That partnership would be threatened if we were to go down the road which the hon. Gentleman suggests. A web of restriction prevents the growth of jobs, and therefore denies opportunities to the disabled while trying to protect them. I have even this afternoon been to see how a firm—Albert Marston in Wolverhampton — is successfully promoting active participation of disabled employees in its work force.

The Government are not convinced that there is adequate evidence of widespread discrimination on grounds of disability alone to justify any attempt at anti-discrimination legislation. They are convinced that legislation is a practical way to overcome discrimination on grounds of race and gender, but that is based on the principle that there is nothing in a person's race or sex which makes that person unsuitable for a job. However, being disabled may do just that. We must recognise this and act responsibly.

I hope that one thing stands out from this account—that the Government remain unshakeable in their commitment. Let no one in this House or elsewhere be under any illusion that we do not care. We do — passionately — and I will continue to make sure that disabled people are given the help to live up to their full potential.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Nuclear Attack (Casualties)

1. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussion he has had with the British Medical Association about the likely number of casualties following a nuclear attack on Britain; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): Discussions last took place in 1982 and 1983 in connection with the BMA inquiry into the medical effects of nuclear war.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister accept that the review of blast casualty rules applicable to United Kingdom houses, published by his Department a few weeks ago, fully vindicates the claims of the BMA and other organisations that the casualty rates used by the Home Office at the time of the publication of "Protect and Survive", which were repeatedly stated, were hopelessly unrealistic? Will he now admit to the House that in any likely level or pattern of nuclear attack on Britain the survivors will envy the dead?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman does not do himself credit. He knows perfectly well that it is not the practice of Governments to quantity potential casualties in precise terms. That is because actual casualties that may arise would depend entirely upon assumptions that are in the control of our enemies, not in the control of our friends.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that radiation casualties in this country might result from nuclear explosions or accidents elsewhere in the world? Therefore, will he urge doctors to participate in civil defence planning and to drop the silly objection that this will somehow condone nuclear war?

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The point he made is important and adds force to the all-hazards approach now adopted by the Government.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend think that casualties would be any fewer in nuclear-free zones?

Mr. Hogg: No. I think that the Labour party's policy in all these matters is nonsense.

Mr. Heffer: Is it not clear that, in the event of a nuclear war, there will be no victors and that everybody will be losers? Is it not high time that the Government faced that reality? Instead of the Prime Minister going to see President Reagan and telling him to retain nuclear weapons, should she not have gone to Washington and told the Americans to get them out this country?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's remark is singularly foolish. We have managed to secure the peace for over 40 years by a policy of deterrence. The Labour party's policy will destroy the system of alliances that has kept the peace.

Mr. Tony Banks: Has the Minister had an opportunity to read the book "London under Attack", which is a detailed study of the likely impact on London of a nuclear attack? If the Minister has read this book, he will realise that London will be completely destroyed in a nuclear war. When will the Government tell the people the truth, which is that there is no defence against nuclear attack?

Mr. Hogg: This country expects Governments to give greatly improved civil protection. That is what they are getting from this Government, and that is precisely what they would not get from the Labour party.

Civil Defence

2. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what improvements he has introduced for co-ordinating arrangements for all civil defence planning in Government Departments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Planning is now co-ordinated within the framework of a national integrated plan for improving civil defence preparedness.

Mr. Bowden: I am encouraged by my hon. Friend's reply. When will the Civil Service committee report on co-ordination between Government Departments be published?

Mr. Hogg: We are expecting an interim report to be received by Ministers in the fairly near future, but we have no plans to publish it at the moment.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

5. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he first became aware that Dr. Frank Skuse's records were not sufficiently clear to establish the precise formula used in the Griess test he conducted on the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Mellor): Following the "World in Action" programme on 28 October 1985 the Controller of the Forensic Science Service initiated a study to reassess the evidential value of the Griess test. When the relevant case notes were examined in November 1985 it was found that they were not sufficiently clear.

Ms. Short: Does this in any way explain the inordinate delay in the Home Office in concluding whether there should be a further inquiry into this case? Does the hon. Gentleman know that there is growing concern throughout the country that six men who were not guilty of this offence have been locked up for 12 years? It seems to me that there is no conceivable explanation for the Home Office's delay. We do not want the Home Office to come to a conclusion on the case. We simply want it to conclude that there needs to be another inquiry, and for that inquiry to take place elsewhere.

Mr. Mellor: I cannot agree with the hon. Lady. It is right that matters as serious as this should be the subject of thorough investigation and consideration. It may interest the hon. Lady to know that some further important points have emerged only this month, including a final letter from Mr. Mullin, the author of one of the books on this matter and, as recently as 10 November, a letter from the West Midlands constabulary dealing with these investigations. We shall announce the outcome of our considerations as soon as possible. It is astonishing that the hon. Lady, as a Birmingham Member, should state categorically that these men are not guilty. She is fully entitled to say that the matter should be looked at, but for her to rush to judgment in that way seems to show an amazingly one-sided view, which I am astonished she can get away with in her city.

Mr. Cormack: Although my hon. Friend's remarks are entirely justified, and people recognise that, is he aware that there is concern in the west midlands lest the perpetrators of this horrific outrage were not all brought to justice? It is therefore important that the decision on the inquiry is made as soon as possible.

Mr. Mellor: It is because the matter is so important that it is being considered with such care. Care takes time.

Mr. Terry Davis: Is the Minister aware that it is not a case of rushing into judgment and deciding whether people are innocent or guilty, but a case of pressing for an inquiry? Why will the Minister not establish an inquiry to settle this matter, which is causing great concern to many people on all sides politically? Does he not care about such a basic matter of human rights?

Mr. Mellor: Once again, the hon. Gentleman is not doing the subject justice by thinking matters through. There is no question of an inquiry. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering whether to use the power that Parliament has given him to refer the matter to the Court of Appeal under section 17. It is no good the hon. Gentleman waving his hands around. That requires fresh evidence. The question whether there is fresh evidence is being considered carefully. I should have thought that, as another Birmingham Member, the hon. Gentleman's constituents would want some balance in this consideration.

Mr. Stanbrook: Has my hon. Friend any evidence to suggest that anyone was responsible for the Birmingham bombings other than those convicted of the offence?

Mr. Mellor: It would probably be better to deal with those matters when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announces his final conclusion.

Mr. Clay: Is it not extraordinary that the Minister should write to one of his hon. Friends saying that the formula for the Greiss test supplied to "World in Action" was wrong, but does not inform other hon. Members? The hon. Gentleman now says that the original case notes are not clear enough even to determine whether the formula used by Dr. Skuse on the six men was accurate. Is it not the case that the Minister has enough evidence now to come to a conclusion and to get this matter dealt with? Clearly, in view of the reaction so far, all the evidence that the Minister has, the incompetence at Chorely and the fact that Dr. Skuse is not even co-operating, there is enough evidence for the Minister to come to a conclusion now.

Mr. Mellor: Once again assertion is mingled with what seems to be predjudice. The hon. Gentleman knows only too well that looking back through records and case notes of several years ago at what was or was not done will inevitably be a difficult process. The hon. Gentleman knows only too well, or should know, that in so far as the forensic evidence is material—it is certainly material in certain instances—it goes for only two of the six men, because in only two of the six cases did anything allegedly show that they might have been in contact with explosives found on their hands. The hon. Gentleman should not rush to judgment, but should allow these matters to proceed as they are doing towards my right hon. Friend being in a position to make a statement soon about these matters.

Mr. Baldry: In considering both that case and the Maguire case, does my hon. Friend agree that we should not lose sight of the point that Robert Kee makes in his book, "Trial and Error", that in both cases the trials took place according to the proper forms of English law, the jury found the accused guilty, the proper procedures for reviewing those procedures, were applied, and as a result of those procedures it was decided that the convictions were sound?

Mr. Mellor: That is precisely right, and that is why it is difficult to understand the impatience of Opposition Members. Home Secretaries in Labour Governments had to go through precisely the same investigations as we have had to go through. The plain fact is that a jury trial cannot be impugned in this country unless there is fresh evidence that casts doubt on whether the jury would have arrived at the same conclusion if it had been before it. That is, of course, the question that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is having to consider.

Mr. Mallon: Although I recognise the serious legal and humanitarian issues at stake in that case, and in the Guildford and Maguire cases, is there not also a fundamental political dimension? Until these matters are satisfactorily resolved, and seen to be resolved in a just fashion, it will be all the more difficult to continue with the job of trying to bring about justice, peace and stability in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mellor: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman speaks with great sincerity. Perhaps he did not mean what he said, but I cannot help feeling that it is very damaging if there is a political aspect to all this. We are talking about a judicial matter, whether a decision of a criminal court, in a free society, can be overturned merely as a result of political pressure, or whether it requires fresh evidence. We are anxious to separate the question of political pressure, with people rushing to premature judgments based on one-sided and tendentious accounts of the evidence, from the question whether, objectively viewed, there is a proper basis for re-examining the case. That is what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will do, whatever the pressures to the contrary.

Mr. Kaufman: Is the Minister aware that if the men in prison for the Birmingham pub bombings, the Guildford pub bombings, and the murder of Carl Bridgewater carried out those crimes, it is right and proper that they should be where they are? If the Maguires carried out the crime for which they were convicted, it is right and proper that they should have served the sentences that were given when they were convicted. However, if it turns out that those in prison for those offences, and the Maguires who have now been released, were not responsible for the crimes of which they were convicted, there must have been a gross miscarriage of justice, about which the Government should be as alarmed as my hon. Friends are, who have already asked questions. After all, miscarriages of justice have taken place before when juries have convicted people. The Government need to take a very different attitude. If those convictions are unsound, people will have been wrongly imprisoned and dangerous criminals are still at large.

Mr. Mellor: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman and I are in disagreement. It is not for the Government to say whether those people were innocent or guilty, and nor is it, with the greatest respect, for hon. Members to say so. The Government must consider carefully how my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should exercise the powers that he has been given by Parliament to refer a case to the Court of Appeal. When my right hon. Friend has completed the proper consideration necessary in this case with the West Midlands police and Mr. Mullin, along with some reassessment of the forensic evidence, he will announce his decision. But he must do so bearing in mind considerations not of expediency or pressure, but of evidence. That is the way that things are done in Britain.

Crimes of Violence (Sentencing Policy)

6. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received proposing legislation to require judges to consult lay people before passing sentence in respect of crimes involving violence.

Mr. Mellor: None, Sir, though I am aware of the suggestion made by Lord McCluskey in his recent Reith lecture.

Mr. Sims: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. Does he recall the report earlier this week of a case where a man of 25, with 100 convictions behind him, was found guilty of beating up in her bed an old lady to such an extent that she was unrecognisable, for which he received four years' imprisonment, which will, of course, attract remission? Is this not an example of the sort of case of which we have had too many recently, which is undermining confidence in the judicial system? If it is considered appropriate for lay people to be involved in magistrates courts in deciding both guilt and sentence, and if lay people serve as jurors in higher courts and decide guilt, should not lay people be involved also in the sentencing process?

Mr. Mellor: I appreciate my hon. Friend's ingenious formulation of a supplementary question, and I note his experience as a Member of this place and as a justice of the peace. He will understand that I am constrained in commenting from the Dispatch Box on the merit or otherwise of individual sentences. I say exactly what I said when the other place defeated a proposal to allow these sentences to be considered by the Court of Appeal. I said that the problem will not go away, and it has not. That is why we have reintroduced a constitutional and sensible proposal whereby my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, on a matter of public interest, will be able to refer an allegedly lenient sentence to the Court of Appeal. I hope that that sensible proposal will commend itself to both the House and the country.

Mr. Cockeram: Will my hon. Friend recognise that lay people are involved in sentencing in the magistrates courts, which account for 98 per cent. of the criminal prosecutions, and that there is still much criticism of the sentences that are imposed in those courts?

Mr. Mellor: And so there is, Sir. I think, however, that the magistrates courts system is one of the ornaments of our criminal justice system. I pay tribute to its role in dealing with over 90 per cent. of the criminal cases in Britain.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware of recent experiments in confronting the perpetrators of crimes of violence with their victims in certain circumstances—something which appears to be having some success in changing the perception of these appalling crimes on the part of the perpetrators? Is this not something which at least endeavours to get away from the idea that we can deal with these crimes by suppression?

Mr. Mellor: I am not sure from the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question whether he thinks that he is telling me something new. He will know that these reparation——

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister is being offensive.

Mr. Mellor: If the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) says that I am being offensive, that is a compliment coming from that source.

Reparation schemes have been supported by the Government and we are awaiting anxiously a final evaluation of them to ascertain whether some of the initial rather promising reports can be substantiated.

Civil Defence

7. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what civil defence publications he hopes to produce for the general public in the near future.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): We shall be producing a film with supporting printed material, including a booklet, leaflet and a new quarterly periodical, in a few weeks' time.

Dr. Blackburn: Will my right hon. Friend inform the House of any other publication which the Home Office will issue to the public, especially on protection, which is something which applies in war and in peace-time?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, of course. The link is made much clearer by the Civil Protection in Peacetime Act 1985. In addition to updating and introducing new printed material, we are producing a programme that is designed to induce local authorities to face their obligations under the 1983 regulations.

Mr. Heffer: When the material is produced, will the Home Secretary take into account the fact that the local authority that has responsibility for Hertford, where I was born, has said that it will cost £8 million to build bomb-proof shelters to protect the people of that small town? Will the right hon. Gentleman take that into consideration? Is he prepared to agree to some scheme being implemented throughout the country that might save some people if the Government are not to get rid of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Hurd: When the material is produced, it will become clear all over again that civil defence is not confined to nuclear attack. Even in the event of nuclear attack, the survival of substantial numbers could depend on whether elementary precautions have been taken, without the massive shelter-building programme that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. Neil Thorne: Can my right hon. Friend assure me that when the material is produced it will pay due regard to the fact that the Soviet Union still has 300,000 tonnes of chemical weapons, which could be fired at us? The material that is to be produced should pay due attention to anything that we could suffer on that account. Our unilateral action has accounted for nothing and puts the perspective of unilateral nuclear disarmament into true perspective.

Mr. Hurd: That is why our representatives have been active in trying to negotiate a chemical weapons agreement in Geneva and have put forward proposals in that way. A proper chemicals agreement with proper verification is the best way. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) is right. Failing that, or pending that, we are considering the nature and extent of the protection that can sensibly be provided.

Mr. Freeson: As the Government seem, in the voice of the Prime Minister, to be insisting on maintaining the possibility of nuclear warfare should there be an outbreak of war between ourselves and the Soviet Union, why does the Home Secretary set aside so briefly the question of civil defence air raid shelters? If the Government are really serious about civil defence, why do they not undertake a programme of building civil defence shelters, which will at least save many people's lives in the event of nuclear war?

Mr. Hurd: It is precisely thanks to the existence of the deterrent and our intention to maintain it that the risk of war is low. That being so, we must strike a balance in civil defence between measures that would provide protection in the case of that sort of attack and the other claims on resources. During the past few years we have struck that balance more sensibly than have any previous Government.

Crime Prevention

8. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of state for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of the crime prevention pilot projects sponsored by his Department and based in Wellingborough, Croydon, Bolton, Swansea and North Tyneside.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am pleased to report that all the five projects that my right hon. Friend announced in October of last year are making good progress in combating crime.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend congratulate all those who are helping to make a success of those schemes locally, including the Bolton Evening News, with its "Crackdown on Crime" campaign? Will he extend those schemes nationally? Will he invite Opposition Members to end their foolish criticism of such a positive Government initiative?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is right. I shall certainly pass on his kind comments. We especially welcome his support for the extremely valuable work that was done in Bolton. I am sorry that his Labour opponents were not so helpful.

Mr. Chris Smith: Is the Minister aware of some excellent crime prevention pilot projects being undertaken by some Labour-controlled local authorities, such as that in Brighton? Will he ensure that representations are made to the Secretary of State for the Environment so that the expenditure on such schemes is not caught under rate capping or under penalty for grant expenditure purposes?

Mr. Hogg: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the crime prevention campaigns introduced by the Government. However, many Labour local authorities are undertaking measures that are profoundly unhelpful.

Mr. Wheeler: My hon. Friend is generous in welcoming the support from Labour Members for crime prevention, but what does he think of the London Labour boroughs that fund from ratepayer's money a campaign, through the London Labour document "Policing London", against the police in London and against crime prevention initiatives?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has a most distinguished record in crime prevention, to which I pay tribute. The action of the Labour authorities to which he referred is positively unhelpful and damages law enforcement by the police. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Hammersmith, (Mr. Soley), may I ask hon. Members to listen to Question Time?

Mr. Soley: Why did the Government wait until they were pressed by the Labour party to do something about crime prevention? It is clear from the Minister's replies that he does not even know that the five schemes are situational and neighbourhood crime prevention schemes. Because the Minister does not know that, he is incapable of answering the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). When will the Minister have a word with the Secretary of State for the Environment to ensure that funds are made available to enable the neighbourhood schemes to be well funded, because at the moment the Government, not any local authority, have been cutting back on crime prevention and victim support, and they know it?

Mr. Hogg: I am prepared to accept that the hon. Gentleman represents the relatively respectable face of the Labour party, but he must face the unhappy fact that many of his colleagues, both locally and nationally, are profoundly damaging proper law enforcement. As for the crime prevention programme, it is the child of this Government.

Sentencing Policy

9. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about sentencing policy.

Mr. Hurd: We receive many letters about sentencing from Members of Parliament, the public and interested organisations.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is great public concern about the apparent leniency of many sentences passed on criminals convicted of violent offences such as child abuse, rape and other forms of assault? Will he ensure that in future the sentences passed not only allay public concern but give the public the protection that they deserve?

Mr. Hurd: The job of Parliament is to ensure that maximum sentences are adequate. That is why we gave full support to the Sexual Offences Act introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes). It is also important to make it clear that those convicted of serious offences should serve long sentences. I have made it clear that a criminal serving a life sentence for the sexual or sadistic murder of a child may expect to serve at least 20 years and that those sentenced to more than five years for sexual abuse of a child will not normally get parole. Where sentences appear to be wayward on the side of leniency, we are proposing in our Criminal Justice Bill to enable the Attorney-General to refer to the Court of Appeal any Crown court case which appears to raise public issues of this kind.

Mrs. Renée Short: Will the Home Secretary examine sentencing policy as it affects pregnant women? Does he recall the recent case of a woman in labour who was left locked in a cell in Holloway for 16 hours without proper medical care and then had to wait an hour and a half for a taxi to take her to hospital, where a caesarean section was performed but the baby died, strangled by the cord? How does he intend to ensure that that never happens again?

Mr. Hurd: I am familiar with that case and do not criticise the hon. Lady for raising it. Any accusations of negligence will have to be carefully examined to ensure that if there was any shortcoming on the part of the prison service or prison medical staff it will not recur.

Sir Anthony Grant: In view of the increasing public concern about sentencing, has it occurred to my right hon. Friend — with the greatest respect to his distinguished and learned junior Ministers — that the rareified sanctuary of the Bar should not perhaps be the sole training ground for Her Majesty's judges?

Mr. Hurd: That is a very explosive suggestion. I will ensure that my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor is acquainted with it.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: The House appreciates the Home Secretary's concern about lenient sentencing and the fact that he has called for reports, but will he also call for reports on the imposition of savage sentences on young people for political purposes? Does he recall the instances at the Old Bailey in recent weeks of young boys of 18 and 19 being sentenced to seven and eight years' imprisonment for throwing stones during incidents in my constituency? Will he try to discourage judges from reacting to press reports and pressure for long sentences to be used as a deterrent for political purposes?

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir. It would be quite improper and quite wrong for me to take that advice.

Mr. Hind: With regard to sentencing policy, will my right hon. Friend resist the temptation to introduce any statute of limitations in relation to people being tried for offences that were committed a long time in the past? In particular, will he reassure the House, and especially the people of Lancashire, that, should there be evidence to suggest that Miss Myra Hindley is involved in two further murders, she will not escape the consequences of her dastardly acts?

Mr. Hurd: Immunity from prosecution is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, but I understand that in this case he has decided not to grant any such immunity.

Mr. Corbett: Given that we have more people in prison and a higher level of crime than most other countries in Europe, is the Home Secretary trying to suggest that the sentencing policy is succeeding?

Mr. Hurd: I am trying to suggest that there is an overwhelming case, supported by public opinion in all parts of the country, for the proposition that people who commit severe offences should receive appropriately severe sentences. I also believe—the hon. Member knows this, as I have always made the point—that those considering cases at the lower end of the scale should understand the great importance of the wide range of non-custodial alternatives available to them.

Rural Areas (Policing)

10. Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any guidelines for the policing of rural areas.

Mr. Hurd: It is for each chief officer of police to determine the most suitable methods of policing for rural areas in his force. Many forces are now beginning to benefit from the further increases in manpower and resources which were announced earlier this year.

Mr. Harvey: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. In view of the enormous increase in spending on the police force under this Government, would he not consider it a serious error if 40 rural police stations in north Wales were to close?

Mr. Hurd: It is for each chief constable to use the resources available to him as he thinks fit. I am puzzled by the situation in north Wales, as I have received no requests from the police authority for an increase in manpower. I notice that at the end of September the authority was 40 under strength. It is the job of the police authority to recruit up to strength, and if it puts in a request for more manpower, obviously I will consider that request alongside others.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Home Secretary aware that there is considerable consternation in north Wales at the threatened closure of rural police stations? The population of the towns and villages want to see a police officer on foot—as part of the community—and not someone in a car who spends half an hour whizzing in and out of those communities. Will he remind the local police force of this?

Mr. Hurd: It is certainly part of the aim of the increases I am authorising that more police officers should be out and about in the villages and on the streets. I have not only authorised these increases, but I have made it easier for all police authorities, including north Wales, to take sensible decisions about policing by increasing to 51 per cent. the rate of police grant.

Mr. Conway: Bearing in mind the Government's highly successful incentives to expand the role of special constables and their recruitment, will my right hon. Friend look at ways in which the attraction of serving in the special constabulary could be expanded in rural areas? That would enable the return of more policemen on the beat represented by citizens who will serve their community without renumeration.

Mr. Hurd: Yes. We are always on the alert for ways of encouraging the special constabulary. After a period as it were, on a plateau, I am glad to see that the numbers are beginning to pick up, and that is very important.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not a rather strange state of affairs that the Tory Goverment seem to have some difficulty in getting police into the rural areas, as shown by questions asked by Conservative Members, yet during 1984-85 the Government filled all the pit lanes they could find in almost every coalfield in Britain with police? At the present time there are about 2,000 police down there in Wapping who could be used in rural areas. Is it not ironic that this Tory Government are using 2,000 police officers down at Wapping to get out the News of the World?

Mr. Hurd: Everyone in their senses would much rather that the police did not have to be deployed at Wapping. If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that Sir Kenneth Newman should withdraw all those police and allow the people who want to work at Wapping to be intimidated and prevented from doing so, certainly we on this side of the House would utterly reject that.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. Friend accept that what one might call development growth areas rather than natural growth areas, areas that have grown up on the edges of some of the towns and cities of Britain, present particular policing problems? Will my right hon. Friend consider setting up an inquiry, with chief constables, to consider this problem? The problem might best be served, not by police on foot, which is impractical, or in cars, which is unhelpful, but possibly on bicycles.

Mr. Hurd: The bicycle is very important, as we saw recently at the party conference in Bournemouth. It is for chief constables to work that out. My hon. Friend is right. One of the factors that we take into account when looking at applications for increases in police forces is precisely the growth of such areas, where the population needing to be protected has increased.

Visas

12. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the recent introduction of visa control for nationals of Pakistan, India, Bangladesh, Ghana and Nigeria.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): A number of right hon. and hon. Members have expressed views on the changes, which have been fully debated here and in another place. Many other individuals and organisations have also written.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister now understand why the selective introduction of visa control was widely seen as racist? Does he now accept that the most effective way of dealing with the problem at Heathrow would have been to appoint more immigration officers? Does he further accept that the substantial increase in entry visas has added financial penalties to racial injury?

Mr. Waddington: I wish that Opposition Members would not go around the place bandying allegations of racism. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that such an allegation is quite absurd in the present case. He knows perfectly well that we require visas of more than 60 countries, including citizens of Poland, China, the Congo and Burma. As I said in the debate the other week, I make that white, yellow, black, and brown.

Mr. Dorrell: Is it not the case that the new visa regulations did not change in any detail the right of anyone to come to this country as a visitor? What was changed was a policing system that had been found to be increasingly unsatisfactory, detrimental to the rights of visitors coming to this country and working against their interests. Is it not extraordinary that the Opposition support the policing system that did not work, in the face of one that does?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend is entirely right. As the President of Nigeria said, visas are a technical and administrative matter. It is not a political decision. It is an administrative arrangement, which is of obvious benefit to all bona fide travellers, who will now be able to come to this country with none of the hassle, waiting and trouble that they had to endure at Heathrow because of the need to process large numbers of people whose claims to enter were in doubt.

Mr. Maclennan: How many additional officers have the Government put in place in those countries to handle the visa applications and to ensure that there are not unacceptable delays there?

Mr. Waddington: I think that the answer is 39. I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that at present the system is working smoothly, with 95 per cent. of all applications being dealt with on the same day.

Mr. Lawler: Is it not a fact that 95 per cent. of visa applications being dealt with in 24 hours proves that the system is working efficiently and well? Is not the greatest benefit to our constituents the fact that when they invite a visitor or a relation to come to see them they know that he will turn up at the airport at a time that has been agreed and not hours or, indeed, days, later, as was the case under the old system?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend is entirely right. That is why I regret so many of the scare stories being put about by Opposition Members, who should know a lot better.

Mr. Dubs: The Minister has just asserted yet again that his proposals for the five countries are not racist. Can he then explain why, when British people going to South Africa require a visa, white South Africans coming to Britain on holiday do not require a visa?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman should realise from a glance at the list of countries in respect of which there is a visa requirement that we impose visas when it is necessary for administrative reasons. We do not impose visas for the sake of imposing visas and when there is no operational requirement for doing so.

Football Matches (Public Order)

13. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest programme of measures to improve public order at football matches.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following the improvement last season, which we attribute to the new alcohol control legislation, the introduction of closed-circuit television and the unremitting efforts of the police, with the co-operation of the clubs, the Government remain determined to achieve further progress. The Public Order Act 1986, which has recently received Royal Assent, contains further measures, including the exclusion order scheme, the extension of alcohol controls to minibuses carrying supporters to matches and a new offence of carrying a firework or smoke-bomb at a football match. We have also urged the football authorities to develop and extend membership card schemes.

Mr. Fallon: Is my hon. Friend aware that there has already been violence this season at Middlesbrough, Exeter, Darlington, Torquay and Shrewsbury and that this town centre terrorism will continue as long as away supporters are allowed to roam the country without membership cards? If the Football League will not act, will my hon. Friend legislate?

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support. He is entirely right to draw the House's attention to the membership schemes. We very much hope that the football industry will move towards that. We would prefer persuasion, but I could not exclude any method of carrying the scheme forward.

Mr. Ashton: Does the Minister agree that the violence occurs outside grounds and that violent people having passes would make no difference whatever? When Leeds United fans have been banned from away games, they have still turned up and the police have asked for them to be admitted because it is easier to keep control of them in the ground. If one takes a pass away from a villain, how does it stop him being a villain?

Mr. Hogg: Nobody has suggested that it would be a panacea, but we think that it is an important step forward and we hope that the football industry will carry it forward.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Prime Minister find time today to consider the fact that many building and factory workers have to commute weekly from Gwynedd, the rest of Wales, northern England and Scotland to London to find work because of joblessness at home and the impossibility of getting housing in the south-east of England? When will she introduce an effective regional policy that brings work to the people and gives some hope to those who live north and west of a line from the Severn to the Wash?

The Prime Minister: With regard to housing, one of the problems is that there is not sufficient housing for rent. We are often urged to alter the law to take the controls off. What we have done with regard to assured tenancies helps, but it is not sufficient.

With regard to regional policy, in 1985 Wales attracted one sixth of all inward investment into the United Kingdom and between 1981 and 1985 the number of self-employed people in Wales increased by 27 per cent. Urban programme expenditure has also been increased, so we have had Wales very much in mind.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: In the light of information which has come from Brussels this week that butter is now being sold to Russia at 3p a pound and that beef is being sold at 11p a pound, can my right hon. Friend say whether the Government have yet reached a decision on the European Parliament's request for a war chest of £2 billion to sell food even more cheaply from surplus stores?

The Prime Minister: If there were to be a fund of any size, Britain would have to contribute to it. We do not feel that we should put up our expenditure to Europe anything above the present limits. As my hon. Friend knows, the provision of export funds is sometimes the most cost-effective outlook for surplus products. As for sales to the Soviet Union, when the matter has come before the relevant management committee we have always opposed it, but it is not a matter on which there is a veto.

Mr. Kinnock: May I ask the Prime Minister a question about the conduct of the Attorney-General? Is she aware that, in court in Australia, Sir Robert Armstrong has testified that officers of the Crown had photocopies of Mr. Chapman Pincher's book several weeks before it was published in 1981? He has said in court that "of course" the book contains a substantial amount of information from former officers of MI5 which, in Sir Robert's view, "could certainly prejudice national security, including current and future operations".
Is the Prime Minister aware that Sir Robert has further testified that the decision of the Attorney-General in 1981 was that there was "no basis on which an injunction could be launched" to prevent the publication of Mr. Pincher's book? Is it not obvious that any Government who had foreknowledge that information prejudicial to national security was to be published would have absolutely no difficulty obtaining an injunction against its publication? Can the Prime Minister tell us precisely why she accepted that decision by the Attorney-General not to seek an injunction to prevent publication of Mr. Chapman Pincher's book, which was obviously prejudicial to national security?

The Prime Minister: Proceedings continue in the Supreme Court of New South Wales. Particularly as the Government are the plaintiff in the case in Australia, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the case — [Interruption.] — or on matters in issue in the proceedings so long as these continue. Some of these matters may be relevant to the proceedings in court. With regard to some previous books, there are questions on the Order Paper for written answer, I believe to the Attorney-General, who will, of course, answer in his own way.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister giving us an undertaking that she will make a full and detailed statement about the additional information that has become available as a consequence of Sir Robert's public testimony? Meanwhile, given that these considerations affect the particular case of Mr. Wright, will she tell us why they did not appear to affect the case of Mr. Chapman Pincher—or the case of Mr. West, when he published his book in 1982? Will the right hon. Lady, even now, explain the huge inconsistencies in the Government's approach to these three cases?

The Prime Minister: I am standing by the answer that I have just given, and I would have thought, with all due respect to the right hon. Gentleman, that he would know that it would not be possible to answer in any event from the Government Dispatch Box in the kind of detail that he is requiring. When the case is over, we shall, of course, consider carefully any questions that are put to us in the light of the usual customs and conventions.

Q2. Mr. Heddle asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Heddle: Will my right hon. Friend turn her attention to local government? Did she note on the front page of The Times today that at last the Leader of the Opposition has admitted that extremism exists in a great number of Labour councils—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must get his question in order.

Mr. Heddle: Will my right hon. Friend take time to read page 1 of The Times today, where the view is expressed by the Leader of the Opposition that a growing number of Labour-controlled councils are now run by extremists? Will she take time to read page 2 of The Independent which reports that the shadow Chancellor has castigated the "borrow now, pay later" policies of these councils? Are not these authorities piling up hundreds of millions of pounds of debt, thus imposing intolerable burdens on factories, firms and people?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the scale and size of the borrowing of some local authorities is giving cause for great concern because they are spending now, mortgaging the future and putting penalties on future generations. As my hon. Friend is aware, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment anounced his intention to legislate against deferred purchase schemes, and that legislation would extend back to catch schemes from 22 July onwards. I believe that that legisaltion will be brought before the House shortly.

Q3. Mr. James Lamond asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lamond: Would the right hon. Lady not be well advised to spend some time today getting down in black and white, signed and sealed, everything that she can recall about the alleged agreement that she recently reached with President Reagan in the United States, especially about his promise to supply Trident in the future, as according to The Daily Telegraph, Today and a number of other newspapers, it seems that the President's memory of things that have happened — such as the discussions at Reykjavik and the supply of arms to Iran—is becoming increasingly unreliable hour by hour?

The Prime Minister: There is already available an agreed statement issued at the press conference on the talks between the President and myself on arms control matters.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a sign of how far behind the times the Labour party is that it still—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must get his question in order.

Dr. Clark: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to observe that the Soviet Union is planning to privatise various small businesses at the same time as the Labour party is planning to take into national ownership various major British companies?

The Prime Minister: I am certain that any small steps towards freedom in that country will be widely welcomed.

Dr. Owen: How does the Prime Minister justify the persistent supply of military equipment to Iran since she has been in office? In view of her decision not to do anything to prolong or exacerbate the Iraq-Iran conflict, how does she justify the sale of spare parts for Chieftain tanks and Scorpion armoured cars, which have been used on the front and were sold in 1985? Can she assure the House that no spare parts or any other military equipment have been supplied to Iran in 1986?

The Prime Minister: As I said last week, the policy was set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on 29 October 1985. With regard to some of the matters that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned, he will know that some contracts were placed and paid for during the time of the Shah. Some of those items have been sent in small quantities and others remain in the United Kingdom.

Q4. Mr. Cockeram asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cockeram: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the level of direct taxation in the United Kingdom, particularly the 29 per cent. starting rate, is among the heaviest in the Western world? Will she further confirm that her Government are committed to reducing that burden?

The Prime Minister: The starting rate is certainly extremely sharp. We have concentrated on trying to increase the amounts of tax-free allowances to taxpayers and we have increased them considerably in real terms. We have also reduced both the standard rate—from 33p in the pound, where it was in 1979, to 29p—and top rates. It is still our hope and intention further to reduce income tax as and when circumstances permit.

Q5. Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Alton: Does the Prime Minister agree that the potential of the Anglo-Irish Agreement was well illustrated earlier this week by Mr. Peter Barry's call for members of the Catholic community in Northern Ireland to join the Royal Ulster Constabulary? Does she agree that the best interests of Northern Ireland would now be served by calls from people on both sides of the divide in Northern Ireland fully to support and back law enforcement agencies?

The Prime Minister: I wholeheartedly support the request for people in both communities fully to back the law enforcement agencies, and I pay tribute to those agencies.

Mr. Fletcher: Has my right hon. Friend seen today's reports that the Labour party has put Scottish devolution back on the agenda for the general election? Will she join me in welcoming that further evidence that the Labour party has nothing to offer Scotland other than its failed policies of the 1970s — more government, more rates, more taxes and no economic growth?

The Prime Minister: I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend and I congratulate him on the way in which he has put his question.

Q6. Miss Boothroyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Miss Boothroyd: Is the Prime Minister aware that the price of gas supplied to British manufacturers is already far in excess of that paid by our European competitors? As she regards it as crucial that British manufacturers reduce their costs and become more efficient, can she guarantee that privatisation will not further increase prices? And will she tell Sid?

The Prime Minister: The Government's record on fuel prices is far better than the record of the previous Government. The record of gas is also very good. The record of gas under privatisation will exceed even that which it has had in the past five or six years.

Q7. Mr. Hayward asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hayward: Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity today to look at the crime figures published by the Avon and Somerset police authority, which show that street crime has fallen to below 50 per cent. since Operation Delivery? Does that not vindicate the tough action taken by the police where appropriate and the active support of most of Bristol's citizens for that operation?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I should like to congratulate the police force on its excellent work. When the police went into St. Pauls in strength many people there were wholeheartedly behind them and the results of that action are shown in the present figures.

Q8. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Prime Minister aware that since 1979 her Government have fiddled official statistics by between 25 and 30 times? How many more times will she fiddle figures in various Government Departments between now and the next election?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that that is not the case. What he is doing is reflecting upon the professional standards of those who serve us.

Mr. Wareing: On a point of order arising out of questions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take points of order after business questions.

(j) HC 21-xxii (1985-86) para 2

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science made a further intervention yesterday in his efforts to wreck the settlement agreed between the teachers and the employers in the course of last week. That intervention has led to a serious anxiety that the Government will try to impose a settlement with all the awful consequences for education. Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Secretary of State for Education and Science makes a statement as quickly as possible giving an undertaking not to make such a destructive imposition?

As the House will not have an opportunity to debate the outcome of the Government's review of student support for some months, will the right hon. Gentleman now make time available for a debate on the urgent needs of all students in higher education?

When are we likely to have the rate support grant statement?

There is considerable anger about the substantial cut that has been made in Arts Council funding. When will the House have an opportunity to debate that matter which affects so many parts of Britain?

In the light of the Prime Minister's confused statement yesterday in the Financial Times interview, in which she implied support for a merger between the Ford Motor Company and the Rover Group and, therefore, a virtual end to British-owned car production, will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make an early statement in order to confirm or deny what the Prime Minister seemed to be saying yesterday?

Finally, I ask the Leader of the House, as a man of rectitude, how many more cases of insider trading we must have to convince the Government that self-regulation in the City is absolutely no answer? Will he accept that he will have our full co-operation if the Government, even at this late stage, bring forward legislation to set up a proper statutory agency to restore law and order in the dealings in the City? Will he make Government time available for a debate on an issue which truly shows the ugly and unacceptable face of the system?

Mr. Biffen: I shall take those six points in the order in which the right hon. Gentleman presented them.

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not mind my describing as wholly tendentious his description of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in seeking to secure a reasonable taxpayers' presence in what is being debated in the educational world. My right hon. Friend has said from the outset that he would make a statement at the most appropriate moment, and I stand by his remarks.

As to the second point, it might be helpful if we tried, through the usual channels, to secure a debate on student support.

The timing of the rate support grant statement will be broadly similar to what happens normally in these matters, but I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

I realise that Arts Council funding is a matter of public interest, although I suspect that our economic and social fabric will withstand some of the things that now seem to terrorise the council. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts will be answering questions on Monday, so perhaps that will provide an early opportunity for this matter to be raised.

A statement is not necessary to dispose of the self-induced misunderstanding of what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said about the relationship between British Leyland and Ford, but as ever, in generosity, I shall refer the right hon. Gentleman's anxieties to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The House has just enacted wide-ranging and profound legislation, the Financial Services Act, and the system is a combination of both statute and self-regulation. This matter will quite properly be monitored by the House. I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman says, but I can see no prospect of a debate next week.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): In the absence of devolved government in Northern Ireland, does my right hon. Friend consider that it is satisfactory that we should legislate for Great Britain by the conventional Bill procedure but that we should legislate for Northern Ireland by Order in Council, unamendable and frequently late at night?

Mr. Biffen: That has been the practice in the fairly recent past and, in all candour, I can see no likelihood of its being altered in the balance of this Parliament.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the provision in the new Criminal Justice Bill whereby social security claimants will have their fines deducted at source? Is this provision to be made available to the rest of the community? Will there be a statement on the reduction of £4 million in the budget of the Public Health Laboratory Service, which conflicts with the Secretary of State's avowed claim that the Government will do all that they can to combat AIDS?

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer both points to those of my right hon. Friends who are responsible for the legislation.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): I ask my right hon. Friend about early-day motion 35.

[That this House congratulates and thanks all those whose efforts contributed to the prevention of the hideous crime planned, executed and so nearly effected by Nezar Hindawi, and to his conviction; recognises the existence of international gangs who are prepared to commit mass murder in pursuit of their objectives and that the maximum penalty permitted by law of life imprisonment does not appear to be a sufficient deterrent; believes that fresh consideration should be given to extending the death penalty, now limited to crimes of treason and piracy; and asks the Leader of the House to give time for these matters to be debated.]

I know that he will wish to see how many Members support it before making a decision, and he may know that the number has already reached 150, although not all the names are on the Order Paper. I know that my right hon. Friend will not try to fob us off by suggesting that we raise these matters on the Criminal Justice Bill. Will he keep in mind the fact that hon. Members have signed the motion not to go over matters that the House has often debated, but to discuss capital punishment in the context of the hideous villainy of international gangs and the increased risks to which our people are subjected as disclosed by the Hindawi case?

Mr. Biffen: It was my right hon. and learned Friend who referred to the Criminal Justice Bill. I hope, therefore, that he will not be too distasteful about the possibility of using that Bill as a means of ventilating the very subject that concerns him — always, obviously, subject to the judgment of the Chair. I cannot encourage my right hon. and learned Friend to think that the Government will make specific time available for a debate on this topic when there are other possibilities.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that last week hundreds of parents of very severely disabled children lobbied Parliament because they want conductive education for their children? The system of conductive education has been proved in Hungary to enable some children to walk who have never walked before. As we do not have conductive education in Britain, many of these parents are going to Hungary in a desperate attempt to get help for their children. May we have a debate on that subject next week, please?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I shall bear in mind the right hon. Gentleman's request, but I cannot offer a debate next week.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Quite apart from the somewhat acrimonious exchanges at Question Time on the Birmingham bombings, about which I am not fully informed, has my right hon. Friend studied early-day motion 67, which has been newly tabled with all-party sponsorship?

[That this House notes the doubt felt in both Houses of Parliament by two former Home Secretaries, by Lords Devlin and Scarman, by the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, by the Editor of The Times newspaper, by other respected observers and by members of the public who have viewed various television programmes on the matter, as to whether those accused in the Guildford and Maguire explosive cases were justly convicted, despite confirmation of their conviction by the Court of Appeal; urges the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the interests of the highest standards of British justice, of which this country needs to feel rightly proud, to move forthwith for the appointment of a public inquiry presided over by an independent figure of legal standing, to be assisted by one or more lay assessors of relevant qualifications; and would deplore any further delay, since several of those convicted are still in prison.]

In view of the widespread all-party concern, may we have an interim statement—perhaps next week?

Mr. Biffen: I admire my hon. Friend's courteous persistence in these matters. Of course I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to his request.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In the light of the unsuitability of the two vessels that have been chosen to police the Falkland islands fisheries zone, would it not make good sense to hold an early debate on the management of the Falkland islands fisheries zone and the larger questions concerned?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot accept the premise of that request. However, the hon. Gentleman might like to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will doubtless be aware of the growing and widespread interest, both inside and outside the House, in the question of scientific and technical advice to Parliament. Is there any possibility of the House having a debate on the subject before the end of the year?

Mr. Biffen: I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's point. However, there are many pressures on Government time in this phase of the parliamentary year, as he will understand from the business that I have just announced, when we are trying to secure the Second Reading of as many Bills as possible.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the Leader of the House say what progress he is making in his inquiries into the case for an office of technology assessment? Tomorrow the House is to debate a very important issue, AIDS, upon which the House and the public have the greatest need for the most balanced and up-to-date scientific and technological advice.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right when he says that that is a requirement for tomorrow's debate. I believe that those agencies that are advising the House are doing so in good faith and on a comprehensive basis. They do not necessarily need the facility that the hon. Gentleman is championing.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, so far as an office of technology assessment is concerned, we are in a unique position in the United Kingdom, in that still no advice is provided for Members of Parliament? Will he bear in mind that an Adjournment debate would be quite unsatisfactory? Therefore, will he give Government time for a proper discussion of this matter?

Mr. Biffen: I must say in all charity to my hon. Friend that I do not think he enhances his case by suggesting that this is, on the whole, an uninformed House of Commons. In my view, the debates in this place are conducted on the necessary information that is available, linked to the passion and the enthusiasm that must go with it. The debates will lose if they are drowned in a mass of technical gobbledegook.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Andrew Faulds.

Mr. Banks: You always choose my hon. Friend, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Faulds: I am so glad that you have some sense of priorities, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Banks: It is agism.

Mr. Faulds: Well, it may be agism, but I am an elder statesman and I deserve it. In view of the appalling and declining standards of British Rail performance in some of the regions of Britain, and particularly between Paddington and Birmingham, are the Government prepared to give time to my impending ten-minute Bill which will require British Rail management at all levels to travel to work on whatever British Rail services are available?

Mr. Biffen: It sounds like a fascinating prospective piece of legislation, but superficially I would judge it to be hybrid.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): In view of Monday's debate on what is laughingly called the Community budget, and in view of the possibility of further cuts in milk quotas, will my right hon. Friend impress upon the Minister of Agriculture the need to come to the House and say that this is not an opportune time to ask milk producers to pay £90 for basic inspections?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly pass that message to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Tony Banks: May I draw to the attention of the Leader of the House my early-day motion 76?

[That this House calls upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank of England to alter the guidelines in respect of the depiction of currency which are being used against artists; demands that the 18 works by six artists seized by the police in a raid on the Young Unknowns Gallery on 31st October be returned to the artists; and believes that, in the interest of artistic freedom, the threat of legal action by the Bank of England against the artist Stephen Boggs for infringement of the guidelines be dropped forthwith.]

The Leader of the House will see from the motion that 18 works by six artists were seized by the police because they depicted currency and offended the guidelines issued by the Bank of England. Will he arrange for an early debate of the arts as requested by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition so that we can discuss this new threat to artistic freedom?

Mr. Biffen: I have speedily acquainted myself with the terms of the motion. I realise it will be of widespread interest to the House, but, given the difficulties of time at this phase of the year, I refer the hon. Gentleman to arts questions on Monday.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many hon. Members have long held the view that some form of parliamentary oversight is desirable on the activities of past and present members of the security services? Is he further aware that support for this view must have increased as a result of the evidence given by Sir Robert Armstrong in the Australian courts? Will he ensure that at the appropriate time there is a debate on the relationship between Parliament and the security services?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend constructively adds the condition, "at the appropriate time". Of course, there may be a time when this matter can be further considered.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Leader of the House be prepared to meet a deputation from the Opposition parties to consider the Government's legislative proposals for the financing of local government in Scotland which appear to be designed to take control over local authorities in Scotland away from Scotland?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman, perhaps because of a little inexperience, is suggesting that a sort of demarche operates through the usual channels. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to test the temperature of the usual channels. If he does, I shall see how things turn out.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As the Lawnmowers (Harmonisation of Noise Emission Standards) Regulations which were laid before the House on 28 October create an entirely new offence with a penalty of £1,000, as they will create a lot of new public servants whose job will be to test lawnmowers, and as it gives the Board of Trade the power to break into people's property to check the noise of their lawnmowers, does my right hon. Friend agree that the least we should have is a debate on this matter, even after 10 o'clock, as requested in a prayer signed by several hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend has touched upon one of those developing measures which underline the enthusiasm, the zeal and the eternal unity of the European Community. There are well established procedures for debating these various documents, and I hope that my hon. Friend will try to secure a debate through those procedures.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Leader of the House aware that high-ranking British Army officers, including the commanding officer of 2 Para, Lieutenant-Colonel David Parker, were invited to address the conference organised by a CIA sponsored commercial organisation in London at the beginning of this month? That was revealed in this week's Militant newspaper. Will the Leader of the House explain how, at the Dispatch Box, the Prime Minister can denounce terrorism, when this conference was organised two weeks ago to discuss supporting terrorist operations against the Governments of Nicaragua, Mozambique and Angola? Will the Secretary of State for Defence make a statement to explain the Government's hypocrisy?

Mr. Biffen: I was unaware of all of those things, which I fear reflects the fact that I would make rather pedestrian company.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will my right hon. Friend consider initiating a debate on the legal implications of people who resign their elective offices prematurely? Is he aware that, of five Liberal councillors who were elected to the district council in Teignbridge at the last district council election, two have resigned completely, two have joined the Conservative party, and the one who remains has been suspended by the Liberal party organisation for putting the interests of his constituents before those of his party? Will my right hon. Friend find it in his heart to refuse a debate on the implications of that, bearing in mind that there are local council by-elections pending in which people will want to consider the advisability or otherwise of electing Liberal councillors?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly, a most powerful subject is emerging. It should command the attention of the House. I regret to say that this has happened with such speed and so recently that we have been unable to accommodate it in the business for next week, but I shall certainly bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): The Leader of the House may know that the Secretary of State for Social Services said that he will supply information to Opposition Members or to any other Members who are interested in tomorrow's debate on AIDS. I have been to our Whips' Office. There is no information whatever from the DHSS, and no information is forthcoming from the Scottish Office on this matter. Will the right hon. Gentleman contact those two Departments and ensure that the information is available to hon. Members who are interested in this matter?

Mr. Biffen: I shall most certainly look into that matter.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the question by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on early-day motion 76 about the problem of artists' depiction of currency. I also refer to the fact that the House and the public are concerned about the receipt of currency by artists. I was the only person to raise the matter of the arts during the debate on the Loyal Address. More than a Question Time involving the Minister for the Arts is required. The country would value a debate in the near future on funding of the arts.

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend has said. I shall bear in mind his request, which I am certain will be echoed by many others as the weeks go by. At this stage of the Session, a large number of Bills have to be launched on their legislative process.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): Will the Leader of the House bear in mind that, without exemption, hon. Members are concerned about the problems that pensioners face during the winter months? We are deeply concerned about the manner in which fuel allowances are dealt with and administered. Without being critical of either the Government or the Department, may I ask whether it is possible for the Minister to make a statement so that the House might determine how best to direct our attention to this problem so that speedy efforts can be applied, money benefits can be placed in pensioners' hands at the right time, and some dangers avoided?

Mr. Biffen: The range of subjects covered by the hon. Gentleman's question go much wider than a mere statement. As we have just concluded a debate on the Queen's Speech, obviously I cannot hold out much hope of another debate upon the topic, but I take account of what he says.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Following the important question of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), will my right hon. Friend seriously consider the possibility of a very select committee on intelligence, constituted by senior Privy Councillors, since Government spokesmen of successive Governments seem in these matters to be, if not deliberately misleading, economical of the truth? Will my right hon. Friend give this matter the attention it deserves. If the House does not, quis custodiet ipsos custodes?

Mr. Biffen: Even if we cannot have the arts, we can have confidence in my hon. Friend. His point has been considered by the House from time to time. The appointment of a Select Committee will be a matter for the House. I cannot go beyond the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken).

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of the suggestions by two Conservative Members today, perhaps the long-running farce in Australia will have served some purpose if, at the end of it all, there is some parliamentary scrutiny of the security services, which was demanded when certain matters were debated earlier in the year. When the case in Australia is finished, will there be a statement by the Home Secretary or the Attorney-General?

Mr. Biffen: I totally repudiate the hon. Gentleman's description of the court proceedings in Australia. As to his second question, I shall bear in mind his request.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): No doubt, my right hon. friend has carefully scrutinised early-day motion 56, which has been signed by hon. Members of all parties.

[That this House deplores the clearly stated policy of the holiday company Owners Abroad of refusing to correspond with honourable Members about constituents complaints regarding holidays taken with the company.]

I am sure that my right hon. Friend appreciates that in a few weeks many of our constituents will be taking and booking holidays. Will he take every opportunity to consider initiating a debate on this subject so that we can protect our constituents who will be ripped off by disreputable and perhaps arrogant and incompetent companies such as Owners Abroad?

Mr. Biffen: Whatever one may feel about the practice, clearly few hon. Members would applaud what the company is doing, but the Government have no responsibility for its actions.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is there any prospect of a debate on the allegation that 17 people now living in this country are guilty of major war crimes? In particular, will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Home Secretary and the Attorney-General whether they propose to make statements about the allegations against Mr. Antanas Gaykas of Edinburgh, which were carried in the Scottish press and which, so far as I know, were absolutely correct, that he was commander of a unit of Lithuanian battalions directly involved in the annihilation and mass murder of thousands of civilians in Lithuania and Byelorussia?

Mr. Biffen: I can offer no prospect of a debate on that topic but, of course, I shall mention that point to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Indeed, he has been in his place and will have heard the allegation.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): When considering the allocation of days to debating private Members' motions, will my right hon. Friend consider the fact that, if one studies the Order Paper, looks at the early-day motions and listens to a number of points of order raised by the Opposition, it is clear——

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman has his hands in his pockets.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member may put his hands in his pockets if he likes.

Mr. Baldry: I am always grateful for your protection, Mr. Speaker. Is it not therefore clear that many Opposition Members live in the total fantasy world of a conspiracy theory and that life to them is one whole conspiracy theory? May we have some days to debate private Members' motions which are devoted to the Opposition to argue their conspiracy theories at will among themselves and allow the rest of us to get on with living in the real world? Perhaps special days could be allocated to them, such as saints' days—for example, St. Jude the Obscure?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the slightly fragile nature of life within the parliamentary Labour party accounts for some of the anxiety that borders on conspiracy. I agree that there is not much that parliamentary debate can do to resolve that. However, I should have thought that the more open the argument was, the better it would be for the rest of us.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a special debate to be held next week, or as early as possible, on the operation of the new visa requirements for visitors to Britain from the subcontinent, and from Nigeria and Ghana? Will he also arrange for some consideration of the cases of those who have been held in this country for more than one month since they tried to come to Britain as visitors on 10, 11 and 12 October? I refer to Mr. Kadir Mia, who is being held in West Lavington detention centre, Mr. Sultan Mia, and Mr. Mohammed Masuk Mia. They all came to Britain as honest visitors, yet they have been treated as criminals and are now apparently to be deported.

Will the Leader of the House also ensure that those who were wrongly removed from Britain after Members of Parliament had made interventions will have their fares paid so that they can enjoy the visit that they had anticipated and can be treated properly?

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the new visa arrangements are proceeding broadly satisfactorily, and that 95 per cent. of visas are processed within 24 hours.

Mr. Corbyn: They have been in prison.

Mr. Biffen: It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to shout at me, but that will not alter my mind. I am trying to point out that I do not believe that there is any prospect of a debate on the matter. However, the hon. Gentleman has raised several points involving individuals, and I suggest that he should try his luck with an Adjournment debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the four hon. Members who have been rising in their places.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate on the situation in which my constituent, Miss Maureen McGoldrick, finds herself? I visited her last night and she is under more stress than she should be. Once again, she finds herself facing a disciplinary investigation by the Labour-controlled Brent council after being exonerated by her board of governors from charges of racism. That decision was upheld twice in the courts. Is it not a total disgrace that she should continue to be hounded by that Left-wing Labour authority, and that no Opposition Member should denounce it for so doing?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has raised an issue that has received wide publicity, and I am sure that there is general concern in the House, at least among Conservative Members, about what seems to be the present state of affairs. I cannot hold out the prospect of a debate in Government time, but I very much hope that my hon. Friend will be able to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): Further to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), may we have a full debate on extremism in local government? In my constituency, an avowed Marxist represents the Labour party on Bristol city council, and his wife is now standing as a Labour party candidate for the neighbouring ward. Presumably she is also a Marxist.

Mr. Biffen: Important though the topic is, it is simply not feasible to offer Government time for such a debate. However, there are many other opportunities to raise the matter, and I wish my hon. Friend success in that regard.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Following the Leader of the Opposition's remarks, may we have an early debate that will reassure the House that there are no zealots lurking deep within the Conservative Government who want to increase public spending by £28 billion a year resulting in the largest ever tax increase in our history, no zealots who want to indulge in one-sided disarmament tactics, and no zealots who want to prevent the largest ever number of ordinary people from buying shares? Alternatively, does my right hon. Friend think that the Leader of the Opposition should look for zealots on his own Front Bench before looking at the loony Left councils that his party controls?

Mr. Biffen: The reference to zealots within the Conservative Government has me confused. I am hoping that my hon. Friend will, therefore, correct the Official Report so that I can then make my response. But on Conservative Benches there is a sense of balance and a desire to judge all these matters in a practical and unideological way, thus striking a natural chord with the British public in total contrast to the zealots that the Leader of the Opposition sees rising up in the city halls and urban centres, and which will eventually swamp the Labour party.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern at the continuing misuse by Labour councils of ratepayers' money, which is spent on political and partisan propaganda? Should not something be done quickly, particularly as Leicester city council is now advertising in the Labour Party Weekly for jobs with the chief executive? When will the local government Bill come before the House? Will it contain provisions affecting such propaganda? Will it give more effective control over the allocation of inner area programme funds? Much of that money is deliberately sent to Labour party organisations within councils such as Leicester.

Mr. Biffen: As I listened to my hon. Friend's abominable indictment and reflected on the inevitably rather measured processes of government, I realised that my hon. Friend, who is a man of speedy decisions, was outlining a subject that was suitable for someone who had come third in the ballot.

Official Report (Division List)

4.6 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on a matter of importance for the House and the country which arises out of a possible mistake in the Official Report. In columns 667 and 668 of the Official Report, the Division List for those going into the No Lobby against the Queen's Speech shows the names of the leader of the Liberal party and 14 of his colleagues, but fails to mention the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), the Liberal Chief Whip. Can that be right, or is the hon. Gentleman no longer the Liberal Chief Whip?

Mr. Speaker: I know nothing about these matters. The hon. Gentleman knows that only those who vote in the Division Lobby have their names recorded.

Mr. Peter Wright (Australian Court Action)

4.7 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a matter that is important, urgent and specific, namely,

"the need for the Government to withdraw from proceedings in the Australian courts against Peter Wright."

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that I raised this issue on 21 July and again on 25 July 1986, when I sought successfully to break the injunctions affecting The Guardian and The Observer. I ask today that the Government withdraw, and I set out my reasons.

The House needs to know why Messrs Blair, Symons, Simkins, Cairncross, Demowbray, King, Leigh, Harmer, Luke, Robertson, Foster, Burgess and his wife, Colonel William Skerden and Colonel Leo Long, Sir Ashton Roskill, Sir Robert Mackenzie, Sir Martin Furnival Jones, Lord Clanmorris, Lord Dacre, and Lord Victor Rothschild have not been dragged through the courts in an attempt to block publication of books for which they gave evidence as former security officers. If the answer is that the Government believe that the Wright position is different, because Wright was publishing a book himself, why did they not take action in the Irish courts against Brandon publishers for the book by Joan Miller, who was a special assistant to Maxwell Knight, former head of——

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot take it now.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There is a parallel: no action in the Irish courts, yet action in the Australian courts. The House needs to know why, prior to the Wright case being heard in the Australian courts, the Government refused to make a statement that they were intending to prosecute Mr. Arthur Martin, a former MI5 officer, and Mr. Rupert Allason, a Conservative parliamentary candidate and author of the book, "A Matter of Trust", when Mr. Martin passed to Mr. Allason classified information——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make the speech that he might make if his application is granted. He must say why the matter is urgent, specific and important.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is precisely what I am doing. I have abbreviated my remarks to ensure that I am in order.

To be brief, perhaps I may draw attention to a letter from Mr. Pincher to Mr. Wright, which will undoubtedly influence your judgment, Mr. Speaker. It said:

"On New Year's day I was shooting with Havers, the Attorney. . . Havers told me that West met Martin six times, and on each occasion Martin told West secret information. In addition he showed him secret documents which should not have been in his possession. West then wrote his book and in it not only quoted Martin by name but quoted from the documents saying that they were secret! Havers then issued an injunction to have the offending parts removed, for had the book been published, the Government would have had no option but to prosecute both Martin and West . . . Havers told me"— that is Pincher—

"that he is still considering whether to prosecute Martin but says he cannot do that without prosecuting West who has been adopted as a Tory candidate! Mrs. T. is furious with him."—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his time and he must now bring his application to a close.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Mr. Speaker, he goes on to say——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his three minutes. I am sorry.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps I can conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by referring to other matters that are directly relevent—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the new rule, which is not so new because we have known about it for six months. The rule is that an application under Standing Order No. 20 must be limited to three minutes. The hon. Gentleman must now complete his application with his peroration.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that sedentary interjections and proper interventions of your own have prevented me from having a full three minutes. The House needs to know about conversations——

Mr. Speaker: Order——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: —that a former head had——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In fairness to everyone, three minutes must be the limit. The hon. Gentleman has had four minutes, which takes into account any interventions that I may have made.

The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: —that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for the British Government to withdraw from proceedings in the Wright case in the Australian courts".

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) rose——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I hope that any further points of order will not challenge what I have said.

Mr. Sedgemore: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you will make a ruling on the propriety of what my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has done. I have seen the documents and I have heard what he has said. He appears to be traducing the Attorney-General in a serious fashion by saying that he has abused the security services for party political reasons. That is an extraordinary allegation for an individual to make against a Member of this place, and I should like to know whether it is in order for my hon. Friend to do so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) must take responsibility for his speech. I heard the very same comments made on the 1 o'clock news.

Mr. Faulds: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not questioning your putting down of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), although it does appear unfortunate that he was not able to extend the evidence he wanted to achieve a Standing Order No. 20 debate. The point I want to make to you, Mr. Speaker, is whether it is advisable to have a three-minute limit on the Standing Order application when often there may be massive material to adduce for the reasons for a debate, which can only be shortened and the request made less effective if this introduction of the new three-minute limit is applied. Is it advisable in terms of the health of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman should seek to become a member of the Procedure Committee, which made a report on this matter and others which was debated and passed by the House.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate fully your ruling, and would not challenge it. I accept entirely the attitude that you have taken. Given the severity of the allegations that we have heard, you will appreciate the difficulty in which the House finds itself. We have been told that the Attorney-General is aware of six occasions on which security information was passed by members of the security forces——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a matter for me in any way. I have no knowledge of these things. I heard about them on the news, and now I have heard about them in the House.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) should be allowed to complete his point of order before other hon. Members intervene.

Mr. Williams: It must be a matter of great concern to the House when the Attorney-General, who is in charge of the administration of justice, and the Prime Minister, who is in charge of security, have both colluded, according to the letter, to avoid taking action to prosecute someone who has been party to a breach of state security. Because, for reasons which I well understand, you cannot allow us to have a debate on the matter at this stage, may I ask the Leader of the House, through you, to arrange that on Monday we have a statement from the Prime Minister?

Mr. Michael Morris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the guidance of the House, could you tell us whether, given that you heard about this matter on the news at 1 o'clock, it is in order under the new rules for Standing Order No. 20 applications for such issues to be raised subsequent to something that was heard on the news?

Mr. Speaker: It is in order. The application was submitted before 12 o'clock.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take first the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Mr. Winnick: You have ruled, Mr. Speaker, although your ruling was challenged, that the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is not sub judice. Allegations have been made concerning the Attorney-General, and I know that these are not matters for you. My point of order is this: would it not be right to come to the conclusion that, as this is not a matter that is sub judice, it would be in order for the Attorney-General to come to the House, if he wished to do so? The fact that the case is proceeding in Australia——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The only conclusion to which I need come is whether the matter is in order. I cannot speculate on other matters.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that I can help the hon. Gentleman. Is his point of order on a different matter?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It cannot be a different matter, Mr. Speaker. I have raised an issue——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled on the matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: No, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled on the matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have seen repeated attempts over the recent past on the Floor of the House to bring about a debate in the Chamber on the matters that I have sought to raise in my application under Standing Order No. 20. I do not see why Parliament should be shackled——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: —because Ministers——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: —do not wish such a debate to take place.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is unlike the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is monstrous.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced parliamentarian and knows full well the rules of the House. He has made his submission and I have ruled upon it, and that is the end of the matter.

Mr. Faulds: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is a procedural point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a helpful point of order?

Mr. Faulds: On a procedural point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you be kind enough to advise hon. Members—we want to take the quickest action possible — how we can proceed to impeach the Attorney-General?

Mr. Speaker: I have no idea.

Moors Murders

4.17 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the moors murders investigation and the implications for prosecution and parole".

This will be a three-minute application, Mr. Speaker. As you will know, the Saddleworth moors are in my constituency. The bodies of Lesley Anne Downey, aged 10 years at the time of her death, and of John Kilbride, aged 12 at the time of his, were found buried in those moors, which are one mile from my home. Today, the Manchester police have started a massive dig-and-search operation on the moors, acting on information received from child murderess Myra Hindley. If other remains are discovered, two important issues will be brought into question. Should any deal be upheld with a child murderess for parole consideration in return for information on other murders? Should prosecutions follow for these other crimes committed 21 years ago?

A debate would provide Members of this honourable House with the opportunity to express public opinion so that our principal Law Officers — my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions—are in no doubt about their duties. If the DPP, in conjunction with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, were ever to be hoodwinked by Myra Hindley and her eccentric friend in another place, they would never rest in their beds. They would be haunted by the spectre of anguished parents and relations who are sadly having to serve their own life sentence. I am convinced that public opinion demands no deal with child murderers and that those who sexually abuse and murder children should stand trial even 21 years later.

If you felt able to grant my request for a debate, Mr. Speaker, you would discover that hon. Members are more likely now to support my call to fight fire with fire. I believe that you would be amazed, Mr. Speaker, how strongly has grown the number of those who would wish to see capital punishment restored for child murderers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the moors murders investigation and the implications for prosecution and parole".

I have listened to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Financing the BBC (Peacock Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Home Secretary, may I tell the House that no fewer than 29 right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in this important debate. It will plainly not be possible to call all of them if speeches are very long. Although I have no control over the length of speeches, I ask for brief contributions.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Before mentioning the Peacock report it might be sensible to say something briefly about the principles that lie behind the recent exchanges between my right hon. Friend the chairman of the Conservative party and the BBC about its coverage of the Libyan bombings. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear, it is not for the Government as such to form a view on that coverage, and that certainly applies to the Home Secretary, but the principles involved are worth restating.

First, the BBC has a responsibility, contained in article 13 of the licence and agreement, to refrain from sending any broadcast matter expressing its opinion on current affairs or on matters of public policy. It has also undertaken to treat controversial subjects with due impartiality. Those are responsibilities assumed by the board of governors. They put the BBC and those who work for it in a different position from those who work, say, for a newspaper or a cable company. Those responsibilities were undertaken in return for the privilege granted by Queen and Parliament in the charter of exercising what was once a monopoly and is now half a duopoly.

Second, it is not for the Government to enforce that responsibility as regards the normal content of the BBC's output. The responsibility rests on the board of governors. Under the charter and the licence and agreement the Home Secretary has some powers, but it is clear from the texts and from past practice that those powers should be used only in an emergency or wholly exceptional circumstances. As I have already stated in public, the Government have neither the power nor the wish to control the normal output of the BBC.

Third, any group or individual who believes that a broadcasting authority is falling below the standards set has an absolute right to say so. There is no reason why the chairman of the Conservative party should be deprived of that right. My right hon. Friend has shown himself entirely capable of distinguishing clearly between his duties as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and his role as chairman of the Conservative party. He showed that again during Question Time on Monday.

Broadcasters have no reason to believe themselves persecuted or insulted when such criticisms are made, whether by my right hon. Friend or by anyone else. As we observe, they have plenty of opportunities to reply and the public can then judge. Private individuals or political parties have no reason to regard with dumb reverence the output of broadcasters. I have not noticed that broadcasters approach the output of politicians with any such reverence. Both professions are in the public arena and learn to look after themselves. Members of both professions also learn, if they are wise, while defending themselves resolutely, to watch out for the lessons which they can draw from criticisms brought against them. If those three principles are accepted, the recent exchanges will find their proper perspective.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Although the BBC and the other broadcasting authorities should not be immune from any form of criticism and it is the right of private individuals and organisations to complain if they so wish, does the Home Secretary accept that there is a distinction between a private individual or an organisation and the chairman of the Conservative party who is a senior member of the Cabinet? Does the right hon. Gentleman really believe that the BBC or the public will not make much of a distinction between complaints by the chairman of the Conservative party and a senior member of the Cabinet—one and the same person—and those by an individual or an organisation? The BBC has been bullied, harassed and intimidated by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Home Secretary knows that full well.

Mr. Hurd: The BBC understands that distinction well. Throughout, my right hon. Friend has been wholly explicit that he has been putting forward his observations as chairman of the Conservative party. It is not the BBC or the general public, but only the Opposition, who wish to blur a distinction which is perfectly well understood.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the Home Secretary make it clear that he is now specifically repudiating the views expressed by the chairman of the Conservative party?

Mr. Hurd: Of course not. I shall not fall into that trap. If I began to state personal views on the issues involved, I would be accused of acting improperly as Home Secretary, by leaning on the BBC. I have no intention of falling into that trap or of adding to the clear points that I have made on the matter.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I do not wish to become involved in the discussion about the chairman of the Conservative party, but it was interesting and valuable to hear him read the rubric under which the BBC must operate under section 13 of its charter. What is the difference between the BBC and the IBA and, therefore, ITN news? Do they have a similar duty, or is it different? Why not mention the other broadcasting authorities?

Mr. Hurd: I did not mention the other authorities because the immediate controversy is not about them. The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) will recollect that in the Broadcasting Act 1981, which covers the IBA, there is a similar but not identical statutory obligation.

I hope that the debate will concentrate on the long-term future of broadcasting in the light of the challenges and opportunities brought about by rapid changes in technology. When I welcomed the publication of the Peacock report on 3 July, I said that the Government would come to a final view on its recommendations only after they had measured parliamentary and public reaction. Some, out of their native cynicism, interpreted my remarks as a signal that the Government had buried the report, albeit with some compliments and a suitable funeral oration, but I hope that later events have shown that that is not true. The Peacock report is still very much above ground, precisely because it provides a stimulating agenda for the decisions which, during the next few years, must be taken on broadcasting.

The debate provides the House with the opportunity to make its views known. We will listen carefully to those views and take them fully into account in the final decisions on the recommendations, which we have not yet reached. From our point of view, the debate is interrogative and exploratory.

The main thesis of the Peacock report has been widely discussed and is now well known. The report argues that the special structure of broadcasting that we have known up to the present day, with its duopoly and sophisticated system of regulation, has been necessary for two main reasons: first, because there has been a scarcity of broadcasting spectrum; and, secondly, because the consumer could not register his preferences directly.

The report argues that technology is changing all that and that new advanced systems for delivering programmes, mainly cable and satellite, will lead to a multiplicity of channels. Sophisticated techniques for encryption, decryption and direct charging will enable the viewer or the listener in due course to pay direct for the programme of his choice. The report predicts that, as those technologies develop, we shall move towards a genuinely competitive broadcasting market with a multiplicity of channels supplied by a wide range of programme providers from which the consumer can make his choice. In summary, that is the committee's view.

There is no doubt that technological change in broadcasting is coming fast, and we should welcome it. I hope that no one will argue as though we were simply discussing the future of the four existing television channels and the existing radio frequencies. That is not so. The initial comments of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on the Peacock report suggested that he was simply interested in the status quo, but the world moves on, and the question is how we move with it.

As I said on 3 July, the Committee's emphasis on consumer choice is very much in tune with the Government's general philosophy and with the broadcasting policy that we have pursued since we took office. We have never doubted that the new systems should be allowed to develop freely with as little interference as necessary from the Government. That is why the Cable and Broadcasting Act set up a new framework for the new wide band cable services, retaining only a light framework of interference and regulation. It is also why in May last year we removed restrictions on the reception of satellite programmes direct by individual dishes, so that in back gardens up and down the country one occasionally sees evidence of a slowly expanding market which is international in character.

Also, after a number of false starts, we asked the IBA, under the new Act, to advertise contracts for the new direct broadcasting by satellite service, which will provide three new national television channels. In response to that invitation a number of consortia have applied for a British DBS contract. The IBA tells me that it aims to make a selection before the end of the year, so there is a reasonable prospect—after past disappointments, I do not want to be absolute about this—of progress being made and of a new British DBS service becoming available by the end of the decade. The same period has shown a rapid expansion of satellite programme channels in this country, some of which are already providing diversity of choice for viewers, not just in this country, but in the rest of Europe as well.

We have given our full support to these developments, but we have also been conscious of the need to ensure that we do not lose the great benefits of our existing broadcasting services. Like the Peacock committee, I pay tribute to the very high quality of many services provided by both our major broadcasters. There is no reason why, as the broadcasting market expands, we should lose the high quality of those services. Often in the past when changes have been suggested in broadcasting — for example, when commercial television was introduced— there have been those who, with much grave shaking of heads, have warned that existing standards of excellence would not survive any disturbance of the status quo. We have been familiar with that throughout the history of broadcasting. There has always been a great deal of head shaking and predictions that changing anything means spoiling everything. I see no reason, however, why broadcasting should not develop in such a way as to retain high standards, supplemented by greater diversity.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is the Home Secretary aware of what happened in Italy when the Italian broadcasting authority, the RAI, was subjected to intolerable pressures? Due to the absence of proper legislation, anyone was allowed free entry and the result was almost 90 per cent. American films, no original programmes and material of a standard which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would not accept.

Mr. Hurd: That is why we put DBS in the public service sector under the Cable and Broadcasting Act and why, although there is a lighter touch and less regulation for cable, there is nevertheless a framework which would rule out the kind of development that the hon. Lady fears.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I welcome the Government's progressive attitude towards extending viewers' choice, but will my right hon. Friend comment on the Peacock proposal that the regional contracts given by the IBA should be put out to tender? Would there not be a danger of losing the valuable provincial services such as we enjoy in the midlands?

Mr. Hurd: I shall cover that and several other points later in my speech.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Hurd: No. I have been warned by the last intervention. I note the hon. Gentleman's interest, but I must get on.

As I have said, the Peacock committee stressed that the two main obstacles to a genuinely competitive broadcasting market were scarcity of spectrum and the lack of a direct means of consumer payment. The shortage of spectrum is gradually being overcome by the expanding cable and satellite markets. To speed up the development of a national cable grid, the committee recommended that both telecommunication and cable services should be delivered over common carrier networks operated by British Telecom and Mercury. However, it also recommended that BT and Mercury should be prevented from offering cable television services or interactive telecommunications services over those networks. This is a complicated matter and it is fundamental to Government policies on telecommunication and competition as well as on broadcasting. We are far from sure that the Peacock committee has got this particular recommendation right, but we shall consider the proposal in detail and we shall be interested to note any views expressed today on this important point.

On the second point — the absence so far of direct payment—the committee recommended the development of pay television systems. This is one of the most important and far-reaching recommendations in the report. If a system of encryption and subscription were technically and economically feasible, it could provide a means of overcoming the undersirable aspects of the licence fee system which have been widely discussed in recent years and establishing a direct relationship between providers and consumers of television services.

The committee commissioned some useful research to provide an appraisal of the various options, mainly on the economic side, but we judged that further and more further detailed work was needed on both technological and economic aspects. We have therefore commissioned consultants to carry out a study. They will be looking at the technological systems available and the feasibility, in terms of both security and costs, of adopting them for a major television service. The study will also consider the economic effect on broadcasters of the various options for a subscription service, either as a substitute for the licence fee, or as part of a competitive subscription market. Finally, it will consider the impact on the viewer. Technology is developing rapidly in this area and there is already practical experience, albeit on a limited scale, in both France and the United States. We have asked the consultants to let us have their report within six months, so they will be reporting to us in the spring. I hope that we shall then be in a better position to assess the potential role, feasibility and possible time scale of introducing subscription television in this country.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I have long been interested in concessionary licences. If we go over to a subscription system, how will that concession operate?

Mr. Hurd: That would clearly need to be considered. If the licence were to fade away or be abolished, the concessions would clearly follow suit, but that is still some way down the road. It will be some time before we can assess the extent to which concessions might be built into a subscription system, but the hon. Gentleman raises a reasonable point which he may wish to develop later.

If subscription proved to be the natural successor to the licence fee, it would clearly take time to introduce. The Peacock committee saw it as an option for the medium and longer term. The central question for the committee was whether the licence fee should be displaced in the short term by other means of finance, particularly advertising. As the House knows, the committee rejected the idea that the BBC should be funded wholly or partly by advertising, because it concluded that, with the present limitations of the broadcasting market, competition for advertising between the two major broadcasters would lead to a reduction in the range and quality of programmes.

The committee made out a powerful and detailed case based both on economic principle, on the committee's assessment of the price elasticity of demand for advertising, and on research of experience abroad. The arguments were pretty forceful and I believe that the onus now rests on those who disagree with the committee's conclusions to disprove the arguments underpinning those conclusions. We have not reached a final conclusion on this and I look forward to hearing the arguments to be deployed today, which will be taken fully into account in the conclusion that we reach.

Once a final decision has been taken about advertising, the Government will need to decide on the various recommendations put forward by the committee for improving the licence fee arrangements in the short term. The main conclusion in that group of recommendations was that the licence fee should be indexed. The committee recommended that in future the fee should be fixed by reference to the retail prices index, starting from a notional licence fee of £60 on 1 April 1987.

There are attractions in such a proposal for the Government, the public and broadcasters. It would ensure for broadcasters a guaranteed and predictable income on an established basis and reinforce their independence of the Government. It would also provide a considerable incentive to enhance cost-consciousness and improved efficiency. Most important, it would ensure that future increases in the licence fee would move in line with the ability of the viewer to pay. I shall be very interested to hear the views of right hon. and hon. Members on this matter. We have reached no firm decision, but we have much sympathy with the approach recommended by Professor Peacock.

Until these decisions are taken, the licence fee remains with us at the level fixed by my predecessor in the spring of last year. At that time he announced that the fee of £58 would run for a minimum of two years, with the possibility of extending that for a further year if no decision had been taken in time about replacing the licence fee. As the main questions raised by the Peacock report have yet to be resolved, I have decided that the present settlement should run for the full three years. Therefore, I can tell the House that the licence fee will remain at £58 for the period from April 1987 to April 1988—that is the third year of the period.

The Peacock committee made a number of important recommendations which affect the independent television system. I come to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway). One of the most significant recommendations was the proposal that in future ITV contracts should be put out to competitive tender. On 3 July I made it clear in my statement that the option for carrying out this recommendation, or indeed any changes to the system, including changes which the IBA has suggested, would be closed off for the next 10 years if the IBA were to proceed under the timetable in the present legislation to award the next round of ITV contracts to take effect from the beginning of 1990.

I have discussed—as I told the House I would—with the chairman of the IBA the means by which the proposed timetable can be amended so that the decisions that we take on the committee's report with regard to ITV contracts may be incorporated in the next contract round instead of having to wait for the next round but one.

I therefore propose that there should be early legislation which would have the effect of enabling the IBA to extend existing contracts, provided that the contractors themselves agree, by a period of three years, which would allow an adequate margin for these decisions to be taken. A Bill for that purpose has been introduced in another place. That Bill has not been brought forward because we have already decided on the changes that should be made. We simply do not want to foreclose the options. There should be flexibility so that the Government, after the next election, can decide to introduce changes which they consider necessary without being told that they can do nothing for a long time because the die has already been cast until the beginning of 1998. Unless the change is made, the IBA would award new contracts which would be likely to run until 1998.

The Government believe it is essential to provide an earlier opportunity for change. The Peacock committee forcefully argued that an increase in the amount of independent production in broadcasting services, independent of the BBC and ITV system—

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I wish to come back to the right hon. Gentleman's point regarding the IBA's ability to extend the existing contracts for a further three-year period. Will the Secretary of State allow the IBA to make any other forms of regulation? There is dissatisfaction with some of the franchises which are currently in hand. It would be wrong to make it impossible or difficult for the IBA to carry out its proper role of ensuring that standards are met by various companies. In certain cases, some companies will be allowed a further three years to print money.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman will have his chance to argue that when the Bill comes to the House. We are in no way modifying the IBA regime under which companies must operate, or modifying responsibilities which the IBA must discharge during that period. I am concerned to avoid the situation, after the election, whereby one is told that any changes that are wanted will not be effective because the next round of contracts is already under way and has to be left under the existing system.

With regard to the volume of production independent of BBC and ITV, the Peacock committee argued forcefully that an increase in independent production would help the general move towards a more competitive broadcasting market, which the committee favoured, and have a good effect on the level of costs and efficiency in broadcasting generally. Many sensible people, inside and outside the broadcasting world, consider that it is desirable to encourage the independent sector for reasons of diversity, freshness and efficiency. We agree with that view and believe that the independents, too, deserve a place in the sun.

Historically, broadcasts have been part of a system where all the aspects of programme production were carried out in-house. The programme was commissioned, produced, scheduled and transmitted within the same organisation. Channel 4 and the Welsh fourth channel show that it is possible to separate production, commissioning and transmission without losing any quality of programme standards. Channel 4 is a publisher rather than a manufacturer of programmes. We believe that independent productions should form a substantial proportion of ITV and BBC television programmes. We would like to see a major shift—a shift more substantial than that so far contemplated by broadcasters.

Peacock recommended an increase of at least 40 per cent. of programmes to be supplied by independent producers over a period of 10 years. We have been in touch with the independent producers, who campaigned for a figure of 25 per cent. Perhaps that is a more realistic goal. We would look for somewhat faster progress than that envisaged by the Peacock committee. However, important issues are involved — such as how one defines independence — which must be considered quickly. I have, therefore, arranged to meet the chairmen and directors-general of the BBC and IBA soon to discuss the means of achieving the broad targets that we have in mind.

Most of the Peacock report is about television, but there are specific recommendations about radio, the most important of which is the proposal that part of BBC Radio 1 and Radio 2 should be privatised. I do not propose to tackle that question in detail today. Our reactions to the Peacock recommendations on radio will fit in with the proposed Green Paper on radio services which I plan to publish before long.

Radio may be a good testbed for pursuing deregulation rather faster than may be immediately possible for television. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because there is a great deal of change in radio. There was the community radio experiment, which was aborted at the last minute. However, we are aware of the problems of the independent local radio companies and we are aware of the proposal for an independent national radio station. There is a great deal of ferment and activity in radio which we wish to encourage. For that reason, it may be possible to pursue a more rapid policy of deregulation, and we will discuss these options in the Green Paper.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South) rose——

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Hurd: I give way to the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds).

Mr. Faulds: The right hon. Gentleman is really talking about the quality of radio broadcasting and the implications, because of the collapse in the last two years, for that quality. He may not remember, because he is not quite as old a Member as I am of this House, that when John—the chap who disappeared——

Mr. Tony Banks: John Stonehouse — he walks on water.

Mr. Faulds: When John Stonehouse was Postmaster-General, I was his Parliamentary Private Secretary——

Mr. Banks: That is why he disappeared.

Mr. Faulds: I am still around, and shall be around for a long time. When I was PPS to that Postmaster General, he introduced a very misguided paper called "Broadcasting in the Seventies". I resigned because I could see what he could not see — [Interruption.] Take this matter seriously. I could see, as he could not see, the implications for the BBC's maintenance of standards of wanting to compete in the commercial market. All that the Home Secretary is now faced with in the decline of standards in radio stems from the misunderstanding of the introduction of that paper. I may have to refer to this matter later in the debate.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's beard grows greyer each day that passes. I do not know what he may have to resign from next, because I am not sure what the next pinnacle of his political career will be. I should be sorry if he had to resign over the quality of radio services, because I do not share his pessimistic analysis of what has taken place. To conclude——

Mr. Buchan rose ——

Mr. Hurd: I was giving the hon. Gentleman his cue.

Mr. Buchan The right hon. Gentleman has talked about the deregulation of radio. Why did he block overnight the one single measure of development that was community-based and had the opportunity of properly serving public service broadcasting in the independent sphere?

Mr. Hurd: That is a fair question. There was to be an experiment, the terms of which were announced, for two years. The service was to be completely free—there was to be no regulation. One had one's licence and there was no requirement even to monitor the output. As the time came closer for that to be implemented there was a good deal of anxiety, which was represented in several parts of the House. There was not a Left or Right pattern. People began to be worried that political parties, extremists—Left or Right—racist organisations, all sorts of people, might get control of community radio stations, and there would be no monitoring, no regulation and no sanction of any sort. We thought of various ways in which we could avoid that by importing a little regulation and monitoring, but that was difficult to do on the basis of the original experiment. The pressure for community radio is there, and the experiment showed that it was there. The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will see, when the Green Paper comes out, how we envisage meeting that pressure.

British broadcasting is thus on the edge of one of those periods of change, just as happened 50 years ago when the BBC took its bold step into television, and just as happened 20 years later when commercial television established itself. I am sure that the House will not lose sight of that basic, underlying fact in the stir of immediate controversies. Periods of rapid change, such as we are entering in the broadcasting world, offer a pretty fair mixture of pain and opportunity, but one will not get through those periods successfully simply by complacency or supposing that one has to stay with the institutions and arrangements of the day. All of us have to rethink our attitudes and, for example, in the House we have to think of what different forms of regulation may be required in the new age.

The prospects are exciting. It is an exciting area, not just because of the new technology, but because of the great wealth of creative talent on which broadcasting in this country has always been able to rely. We have to yoke together the technology and the talent in a way that will bring the greatest benefit to the viewer and the listener. That is the task to which we have set our hands as a Government. It will take some time, and I hope that the House will give us today a first instalment of the guidance and insights that we seek.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): We are debating today the possibility of the most far-reaching changes ever proposed in the structure of British broadcasting. It is important to recall exactly how that has come about.

Year by year, dissatisfaction with the steady rise in the BBC television licence fee has led Governments of all parties to be reluctant, or at any rate cautious, about agreeing to applications for increases in the licence fee. It was interesting to note from the Home Secretary's speech that the Government have decided to peg the licence fee for the 12-month period when the general election will almost certainly take place. That seems like a strong argument for annual Parliaments.

In that impetuous way of hers, the Prime Minister decided that the solution to the long-term licence problem for the BBC was to introduce advertising to the BBC. The previous Home Secretary, therefore, set up a committee to examine and, it was hoped, to endorse that notion. The Peacock committee, having examined and rejected the case for advertising on the BBC as at present constituted, decided to ignore its terms of reference. It "overflowed them", as the Secretary of State charmingly put it in a speech to the Royal Television Society the other day.

The committee set its hand to a fundamental re-examination of the function and role of broadcasting in Britain. As its membership included such free-market zealots as Professor Peacock and the bizarre Mr. Samuel Brittan, who appears to have been the Rasputin of this whole dubious enterprise, the outcome was the document that we have before us today—the Peacock report, one of the most intellectually impoverished and ideologically obsessive documents ever to have been put before the House——

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): It takes an impoverished intellect to recognise one.

Mr. Kaufman: God, that was a brilliant intervention. No wonder the BBC withdrew its libel action against the hon. Gentleman if it was to be faced with such dazzling repartee.

We are all agreed that any consideration of the issues in the report starts from two bases. The first, as the report concedes at the beginning, is that "British broadcasting is the most highly regarded system in the Western world".

The second is that technological advance, especially through satellite broadcasting, and also in other ways, will broaden the scope of television in particular and make possible far wider choice. But instead of using those advances to build on the achievements of British broadcasting, the Peacock committee wishes to dismantle our successful structure and replace it with one that would degrade standards and risk turning our present admired system into an electronic equivalent of the tabloid press.

Before Peacock, the Government put forward modest objectives for change. They envisaged not meddling with the present structure but adding to it in three ways—first, by augmenting television choice by a nation-wide network of cable television, established by merchant adventurer enterpreneurs, on whose profitable systems would ride all the interactive services dreamed of by the present Secretary of State for Education and Science before he went on to higher things from the Department of Trade and Industry. Secondly, there would be a direct broadcasting by satellite consortium, which would further expand choice of programmes. Thirdly, a network of community radio stations would enhance choice for radio listeners at local level.

That entire strategy has, of course, collapsed. Cable has failed to make any real progress, as I warned it would when the Cable and Broadcasting Bill was debated two years ago. The chairman's foreword to the first report of the Cable Authority was published this week. He states the failure quite cheerfully:

"Almost all new developments start off slowly," he consoles himself, and goes on:

"It is foolish to doubt the long term prospects for cable because its initial development has been faster."

The Peacock report is franker and, it has to be said, more doleful. It says that by 31 March 1986,

"of about 130,000 cable subscribers, fewer than 10,000 were connected to the new wideband systems currently under installation following the award of franchises."

Today we have read in the press about what is available to those subscribers. At a time when the Government are deeply exercised about alleged Left-wing bias on television, Cabletel, a cable company in Enfield, has begun offering its subscribers programmes from the main channel of Soviet television, relayed direct from Moscow. It is a great relief to know that, as an alternative to the BBC's Marxism, the lucky residents of Enfield now have available to them direct news of the Thatcherite policies that have been adopted by the Right-wing Soviet Government.

As for DBS, the Home Secretary told the Royal Television Society last week, in his euphemistic way, that "DBS is not coming about in the way originally envisaged." That is "Hurdspeak" for saying that his predecessor's planned consortium has flopped, and the whole project, which should have been operating in 1988, has been delayed indefinitely. The Home Secretary expressed a hope, no more, that it might be operative by the end of the decade.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): The right hon. Gentleman has made many quips about Russian television being received by cable subscribers in Enfield, but is he not missing the main point? However slow is the development of cable in Britain and however slow is the development of British direct broadcasting by satellite, it is inevitable that satellites will be operated from other countries. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that it took about three years for the video recorder to take off in the domestic market. If people buy reception dishes at the same speed, the result of what I understand to be his policy —no change in broadcasting—is that the BBC and ITV will have to compete with popular programmes from abroad over which he will have no control.

Mr. Kaufman: I do not in the least challenge the hon. Gentleman's forecast that satellite television will eventually transform the opportunities available to viewers in Britain. That is axiomatic, but I was talking not about satellite but about cable television.

As I said on Second Reading of the Cable and Broadcasting Bill, cable is a dead duck in Britain because people will buy video cassette recorders and choose their own programmes rather than pay to have them put on cable. That is being shown in the Westminster area now.

Then there was community radio. The experimental stations should by now have been transmitting programmes. The Home Secretary said in response to an intervention earlier that the experiment was "aborted at the last moment" as though that was regrettable and nothing to do with him. But he ditched the experiment because he suddenly discovered to his alarm that the community radio applicants were likely to be less ideologically sound than the programmes on Soviet television. The result is that the Government are now searching anxiously for a new strategy to replace the one that has failed—and along came Peacock to fill the gap.

There are two ways in which to plan the future of British television and radio. One is to build on, expand and vary the country's enviable tradition of public service broadcasting, and to preserve and protect what the annex to the BBC's licensing agreement laid down by the Government declares to be the duty to "provide a properly balanced service which displays a wide range of subject matter".

We should also try to preserve and enhance the generally high standards of ITV which, as every ITV executive will freely admit, derives indispensably from the standards achieved by the BBC. It is from that structure that the Leeds university study commissioned by Peacock concludes that it is "highly probable . . . that the range of choice on any day in the United Kingdom is greater than in most other countries including the United States."

It is because of those standards that the Peacock committee had in its report——

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The right hon. Gentleman is wrong.

Mr. Kaufman: I am quoting the report. If the hon. Gentleman disagrees with it, he is welcome to.

Mr. Holt: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way then?

Mr. Kaufman: Not at the moment.

Mr. Holt: The right hon. Gentleman is afraid.

Mr. Kaufman: Yes, it is true—I really am afraid of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Holt: The right hon. Gentleman is afraid of the truth.

Mr. Kaufman: Afraid of the truth or economical with the truth? We have a choice these days because of the Cabinet Secretary.

Mr. Holt: That is for him.

Mr. Kaufman: It is because of those standards that the Peacock committee had to admit:

"In every country we encountered expressions of amazement — even from NBC and ABC in the United States — that the British should be thinking of changing their system, which is almost universally admired."

Having agreed that Britain has a broadcasting structure which is the envy of most other countries, Peacock brings forward plans to wreck it absolutely on the basis of addiction to the free market economy which is ideologically deranged and, if put into practice, would not merely fail to work as Peacock predicts, but give us not the best but probably the worst television in the world.

Mr. Faulds: My right hon. Friend was extraordinarily charitable in his introductory remarks to the membership of the Peacock committee and commented on only a couple. There is an acolyte of Rasputin on the committee — the extraordinary appointment of a particular lady with an enormous battery of intellectual ability who was chosen for membership because the Prime Minister knew from long personal contact that the young lady had been born from a Tory womb.

Mr. Kaufman: I am not able to go through all of the qualifications for membership of the Peacock committee, but I am ready to accept my hon. Friend's word that some qualifications were even more bizarre than others, difficult as it may be to believe it.

We have a few short-term proposals about financing the BBC in the report. One is to give free television licences to pensioners on supplementary benefit. That at least is on the right lines, but we do not believe that it goes far enough. That is why the Labour party is committed to phasing out completely the television licence for old-age pensioners.

Another, to which the Home Secretary referred, is indexation of the current licence fee. Of course, the tolerability of that course would depend partly on the level of the licence when the indexation started. Yet another is the proposal to impose a £10 radio licence charge on all car owners. That is unfairly discriminatory and hard to enforce, and it would bring in only a fraction of the money that the BBC needs each year.

For that very reason, Peacock goes on to propose that BBC Radios 1 and 2 should be sold off. The report does not explain how the sale should be achieved since Radios 1 and 2 do not exist in tangible form. Exactly what property is to be sold? Is Jimmy Young to be put on the auction block? Is so, as she is reputed to be very fond of him, the Prime Minister might decide to buy him for herself, but he would then not be available to a wider audience.

Mr. Tony Banks: Stick him on the mantelpiece.

Mr. Kaufman: If those channels' airwaves were to be for sale, what would there be to stop the BBC from using its existing allocation of airwaves to provide substitute Radios 1 and 2? If a sell-off were achieved, with advertising on the privatised wavelengths as Peacock advocates, the effect on independent local radio would be crippling if not in many cases fatal.

The Peacock report provides the statistics which show how fragile and precarious are the finances, and therefore the prospects for survival, of many existing ILR stations. A study commissioned by the Newspaper Society shows that advertising on Radio 1 would take £50 million away from ILR and, what is more, it "would be certain to bring about closures"

among local radio stations and regional newspapers.

The murder of many channels of diverse information and opinion could surely not be justified by obtaining a once and for all sum which, at its most optimistic, would account for only a tiny fraction of the revenue needed by the BBC, not just for one year but every year. It also goes without saying that turning BBC radio into a ghetto of talk, however enlightened, and of classical music, however admirable, would be an utter violation of the Government's own requirement in the annex to the licensing agreement that programmes should "provide a properly balanced service which displays a wide range of subject matter".

Peacock's intermediate proposals are based on the supremacy of market forces and the entire subordination to them of quality and standards. As the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) has rightly warned, under the Peacock proposals, ITV and ILR franchises would be auctioned to the highest bidder. Commercial objectives would reign supreme over a variety of choice and lead to a bland mash of quiz shows, chat shows and soap operas — the kind of thing which prevails in the United States.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): What about "Panorama"?

Mr. Kaufman: There are extremely good "Panorama" programmes from time to time.

Mr. Roger King: They cost £500,000 a programme.

Mr. Kaufman: They are worth every penny.

That is not just my conclusion. This is what the Peacock report said would happen:

"Whereas at present both BBC and ITV pursue policies of mixed programming — with schedules which in peak time include news, current affairs, documentaries, serious drama, and science programmes — the requirement to maximise audiences would mean substituting comedy, variety, quiz shows and other entertainment for many of the 'information' programmes and for the more demanding forms of drama."

Cable would also be sold off to the highest bidder and the restriction on non-EEC ownership would be removed. That would be the first of many changes proposed by Peacock, which would allow the Murdochisation of the British electronic media. Channel 4 would be privatised and, undoubtedly, robbed of its distinctive and enterprising character. The night-time hours of BBC and ITV channels would be sold off, with the BBC and ITV companies excluded from bidding, at least in the early years, without any regulation of content for the companies that win the right to use those hours. The Government, with a Prime Minister who proclaims family values at the drop of a hat and a Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster who preaches from the pulpit, would introduce the night-hours porn shift.

Plans would proceed for the BBC to be reduced from a universal service to a subscription service. ITV would still have its channels vulgarised and cheapened, but available to all viewers at the turn of a switch or the press of a button, whereas the BBC would be available only to those who agreed to pay the subscription. That would rule out large numbers of people and the Peacock report readily admits it. Peacock states—this matter relates to the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay)—

"The substitution of voluntary purchase of broadcasting services means that poor listeners and viewers will have to pay the same as rich listeners and viewers for programmes and the rich will be able to afford a greater volume and variety in their broadcasting 'diet' . . . The Committee accepts that a move towards a Pay-TV system might result in those on lower incomes paying more for broadcasting services both because of the charges introduced and their desire to alter their 'mix' of the volume and type of programmes that they wish to enjoy. If Pay-TV had any adverse distributional effects then the Committee would prefer to see these taken care of by alterations in the tax or benefit structure or both."

That is the classic argument that anyone may dine at the Ritz, but with the patronising proviso that the Supplementary Benefits Commission should be asked to pay for the dinner. There is a fat chance under the Secretary of State for Social Services or the Prime Minister of anything like that being done. Peacock wants to introduce poor law rules for the reception of television with the added twist that better-off people can afford to go out for entertainment other than and supplementary to television, whereas for millions of the poor television is the only available entertainment.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman has said, does he agree that all is not entirely happy in either ITV or BBC, despite their duopoly of purchasing power, when it comes to the sums that they pay for cinema films? Will he concede that there must be a different arrangement from the present one so that the sort of films that have been popular on those two channels should be made more plentiful in future?

Mr. Kaufman: That is an arguable case, but I would go further and say that one of the most admirable ways in which the British film industry in its present precarious state can be assisted is by the types of methods used by Channel 4, whereby original, new films are financed with the intention of showing them in theatres as well as on Channel 4. Some of the best recent British films have been made in that way.

From those proposals the Peacock report goes on to propose a structure of subscription television.

Mr. Hurd: Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the question of concessions, could he tell us whether the pledge that he has repeated today that the Labour party will make the television licence free for all old-age pensioners is in the outer circle of promises that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has told us we should ignore, or in the inner circle of promises, about which he proposes to do something?

Mr. Kaufman: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to emphasise that pledge which will be a priority of the next Labour Government. That was a helpful intervention and the right hon. Gentleman must feel free to rise to his feet again whenever he regards it as appropriate.

Peacock goes on to propose a structure of subscription television, which it calls electronic publishing, in which it foresees a Nirvana of a myriad of television channels with each of us tuning in, after paying our subscriptions, to the programmes that please us most. But we can tune in only to what is available, not to what we should like, if it is not available. That seems obvious, but it is made clear in the study by Leeds university which was commissioned by the Peacock committee. It states:

"The audience cannot actually demand a programme. It can only accept or reject a programme after it has been shown. Any system which gives 'more of the same' because the same is highly popular is failing in its duty to the audience, since the latter is not given the chance to accept or reject something new."

That danger would undoubtedly arise from the system proposed by Peacock. What would be on offer would be programmes to please the lowest common denominator and programmes that would amass the largest number of subscriptions. We would be treated, not to the Faber and Faber and Sidgwick and Jackson of the air, as the Home Secretary imagines, but to the electronic equivalent of The Sun and the Daily Express.

It might well be said, "If that is what people want, why should they not get it?" People are much more selective and fastidious than they are insultingly represented to be by the vulgarisers of the Peacock committee. The Broadcasting Research Unit, which is sponsored by the BBC, the British Film Institute, the IBA and the Markle Foundation of New York, has today published one of the most detailed surveys of public opinion on television and radio ever undertaken. In answer to the proposition that television programmes should try and experiment, even if the programmes often turn out not to be worth watching, 65 per cent. of the respondents definitely agreed or tended to agree, whereas only 6 per cent. disagreed and 16 per cent. tended to disagree.

[Mr. Kaufman]

The Peacock proposal is based on the axiom that minority programmes must be made cheaply, but "Brideshead Revisited", "The Jewel in the Crown" and many excellent nature programmes could never have been made on tiny budgets. Moreover, popular programmes such as "Eastenders" and "That Was The Week That Was" started as minority experiments. Perhaps those are precisely the types of programme that the Government want to kill.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is my right hon. Friend going to declare his interest?

Mr. Kaufman: I can only say to my hon. Friend that I would be a great deal happier if one of those programmes were running now——

Mr. Banks: And a great deal richer.

Mr. Kaufman: A very great deal richer. The BBC's repeat fees now are much higher than the original fees.

Peacock accepts that consumer sovereignty should not be paramount because it proposes some half-baked public service sponsor, although information about how it would work and how much money it would have at its disposal is dubious in the extreme. It is impossible to reconcile Peacock's recommendation of the creation of this body with its optimistic forecast that "Discriminating matching of individual viewers' requirements with programme costs will be possible."

That is simply a fantasy conjured up by those who seek to convince themselves that the mirage of a completely free market can be made a reality in a world that simply does not work that way. However, we do not know if it would work technologically, which is why the Home Secretary set up his working party.

The Peacock report is far from confident. It says:

"it is impossible to predict with any accuracy how soon technological developments"— upon which the proposals depend—

"will be implemented. The coaxial cable industry, for example, once heralded as having the bright new future seems to have been bogged down as of late."

Even if the technology were available, it is clear that the subscription base is unreliable. The Peacock report seems to regard as an argument in its favour the information that "nearly a million French households receive Canal Plus". The report claims:

"We are optimistic about the BBC's ability to attract subscription revenue for its two main channels."

It claims in their favour that those two channels

"are not a marginal extra but in the mainstream of broadcasting."

Of course that is the case now, under the present system. However, a million subscribers under a subscription system would not guarantee sufficient finance to retain the BBC in the mainstream. The BBC would then become exactly what the Government want it to be—a marginal provider of minority programmes, subordinated to the commercial giants.

Nobody denies that there will be change, as the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) commented in his intervention. There will be major change which can enhance the opportunities and widen the choices of our citizens. We must harness change and not become its slaves. We must build on standards of excellence, not demolish and repudiate them. That requires careful thought and preparation, and not dogmatic zeal based on Friedmanite wish-fulfilment.

What is more, the regime proposed by the Peacock report for our ultimate broadcasting structure would lack any regulation or controls. There would be a lack of control on sex and violence and for ensuring balance in politics. The same big business political bias that prevails in most of the press would become the rule on television and radio. Of course, that is exactly what the Government want. It is what the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is seeking to bring about by his vendetta against the BBC, which seeks also to intimidate ITV. If yesterday's cosy party at No. 10 is anything to go by, it appears to be succeeding.

The Chancellor of the Duchy holds an office which makes him responsible for the administration of the Duchy estates, the appointment of justices of the peace in the counties of Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside, and for ecclesiastical patronage in the Duchy gift. According to a parliamentary answer given on Monday to two of my hon. Friends, he spends an average of 20 hours a week on those and other ministerial duties. The equipment that he requires for carrying out those duties is unusual.

In answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), the Chancellor of the Duchy revealed on Monday that his suite of two rooms and a lobby in the Cabinet office is equipped with a television set and a video recorder. What does he use them for? Are there many programmes about the appointment of justices of the peace in Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside? If so, does he watch them and record them in order to savour them over and over again? Is there to be a soap opera about the bestowal of ecclesiastical patronage in the Duchy gift, and is the Chancellor to be a consultant on it?

One feels that that public property, together with the electricity needed to operate it, is not being used entirely in the interests of my constituents, and other residents of the Duchy of Lancaster. One feels that it might be being used for wider and more suspect purposes. What is clear is that, whether in his two rooms and lobby or elsewhere, the Chancellor of the Duchy has been watching television in a manner which is obsessive to the point of paranoia.

It is difficult to believe the claim on the first page of his recent letter to the BBC that:

"Media monitoring is not a mainstream Conservative Central Office activity."

Some of the complaints made by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster against the BBC seem—how can I put it—to display a lack of sense of proportion. There is, for example, his claim that the BBC's use of the phrase

"in intensive care with serious injuries" is

"designed to arouse anti-American emotion."

One would very much like to have a psychiatric explanation for the reasoning which led to this complaint against the BBC:

"Strangely, whereas ITN said the hostages were murdered, the BBC merely said they were 'shot through the head' and 'killed', neutral terms which decriminalise the act, although at the very end of their broadcast, the BBC did acknowledge that the hostages 'have been murdered'."

As it happens, ITN did use the anti-American word "shot" as well.

There is also the mistake that the BBC admits to having made—the linking of the American raid on Libya with Mr. Hindawi's planting of the bomb on the El Al plane at Heathrow. That was undoubtedly an error, but it was an error made by others as well. For example, the Daily Mail said:

"Scotland Yard had little doubt that the bombing attack was a direct reprisal for Britain's involvement in the American raid on Libya."

The Sun said:

"The bomb was almost certainly meant for an Arab revenge attack following the blitzing of Libya."

The Daily Express said:

"The plot is seen as the start of reprisals for Britain's part in the U.S. bombing of Libya."

On reflection, I concede that the BBC is severely to be censured for having followed the editorial lead of the Daily Mail, The Sun and the Daily Express.

The Home Secretary referred to those matters today in remarks which were deliberately lacking in clarity, a characteristic of the Home Secretary that has seen him safely home through a number of tight spots. The Home Secretary has a clear duty to the House to uphold the licence and agreement with the BBC which was made by his predecessor, Lord Whitelaw.

A few days ago I wrote to the Home Secretary about this matter and his reply to me, dated 11 November, was very soothing. He said:

"I am glad that this particular controversy is dying down, and welcome the further opportunity to remove any misunderstanding."

That, as I said, was on 11 November. However, four days later, on 15 November, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster stirred the controversy right up again, with his second and even more preposterous letter to the BBC, the one containing the analysis from the anonymous, impartial lawyer, of the Chancellor of the Duchy's acquaintance. I do not know whether that is yet another leak of a letter from the Solicitor-General. On this occasion the Chancellor of the Duchy at least let the BBC see his letter first, unlike the previous occasion when he handed his letter over to ITN to be broadcast on its news before it was put into the hands of the BBC.

I ask the Home Secretary now, so that he can respond in the House—does he or does he not believe that the BBC is fulfilling its obligations under the annex of the licence and agreement, for which he is responsible to the House? That obligation says that the BBC must treat controversial subjects with due impartiality. Does the Home Secretary believe that the BBC is fulfilling that obligation? If he does not, will he tell the House what he will do about getting the BBC to uphold the licence and agreement? If he does not, will he tell us what he intends to do about the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? Does the Home Secretary really want the controversy to die down, as he said in his letter to me? If so, what is the Home Secretary doing to prevent the Chancellor of the Duchy stirring up again the controversy that the Home Secretary told me that he wishes would die down?

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): My right hon. Friend has put a crucial question to the Home Secretary. As he has not responded, does it not follow that he cannot gainsay the fact that the BBC is upholding the licence and agreement? I hope that my right hon. Friend will pursue that matter very hard.

Mr. Kaufman: My right hon. Friend has a particular authority in such matters and he asks that question with that authority. If the Home Secretary does not intervene now when he has the opportunity given to him by my right hon. Friend's intervention, we must take it that he believes that the BBC is fulfilling its obligations under the annex to the licence and agreement and that the BBC is treating controversial subjects with due impartiality. If that is so, it is clear that the intervention of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is even more disgraceful than we have previously said, because the Home Secretary is now implicitly denouncing his own colleague in the Cabinet.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) are simply repeating a question put to me by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), which I answered during my speech and, indeed, in the first three points on which I spent the first five or 10 minutes of my speech.

Mr. Kaufman: All that the right hon. Gentleman needs to do to clear the matter up once and for all is just to say yes or no to the question: does he believe that the BBC is fulfilling its obligation under the annex to the licence and agreement, for which he is responsible to the House, to treat controversial subjects with due impartiality? The right hon. Gentleman has intervened. All he has to do is to say yes or no. [HON. MEMBERS: "He has answered."] No, he has not.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch) rose——

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North) rose——

Mr. Kaufman: When the hon. Gentleman becomes Home Secretary, I shall be glad to give way to him. Meanwhile, we have this Home Secretary and we must make do with him.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden) rose——

Mr. Kaufman: No, the hon. Gentleman is not the Home Secretary either. I want a confirmation. The silence of the Home Secretary must be an implicit condemnation of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for unwarranted and disgraceful charges against the BBC when the Home Secretary himself, by his silence, is making it clear that he is fully satisfied with the way in which the BBC is observing its obligations.

Mr. Gale: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way to someone who has worked for the BBC?

Mr. Kaufman: We now know where we stand. The Home Secretary has implicitly repudiated the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster by his silence. That is on the record.

Every test of opinion shows that the public want an independent BBC, free of Government interference. Lord Whitelaw, the Home Secretary's distinguished predecessor, insisted that the first principle of broadcasting must be to defend the independence of the broadcasting authorities from Government and Parliament. Does the Home Secretary agree?

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Government advise any citizens who have a complaint against the BBC to lodge that complaint with the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. Does my right hon. Friend have any information on why the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster did not take the advice which he sees fit to give to all other citizens with any complaint against the BBC?

Mr. Kaufman: It is a mystery; but then the whole conduct of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster defies any logical analysis and has for some little time now.

Mr. Adley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No, it is the Home Secretary to whom I want to give way.

Lord Whitelaw said that the first principle of broadcasting must be to defend——

Mr. Winnick: Where is the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster?

Mr. Kaufman: I have written to him.

Lord Whitelaw said that the first principle of broadcasting must be to defend the independence of the broadcasting authorities from Government and Parliament. Does the Home Secretary agree? If so, what will he do to defend the BBC from his malevolent colleague who sits with him at the Cabinet table?

The Government today are trying to turn the BBC into a Tory party political puppet, with the hope that ITV will fall into line.

Mr. Gale rose——

Mr. Kaufman: For the future, if the Government follow the Peacock proposals, they will destroy the standards which have brought distinction to British broadcasting and television. It is because we condemn the Government's present anti-BBC vendetta and oppose the Peacock prospect of a free-for-all future that we shall be voting on the Adjournment tonight.

5.35 pm

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Listening to what the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) had to say about the Peacock report, the House will have been depressed but not in the least surprised by the antediluvian and backward-looking approach that he displayed.

The House will also recall, at least from the history books for those of us who are far too young to remember it in actuality, that exactly the same kinds of argument were put forward over 30 years ago by those who passionately resisted the introduction of independent television or any kind of breach of the monopoly of the BBC. So respected have the achievements of ITV been that it took a very few years before the Labour party would not dare to criticise or to threaten to repeal that which it passionately opposed coming into existence.

We also heard from the right hon. Gentleman the gleeful repetition of his electioneering pledge to the pensioners. I think that it was one of the people whom he admires who once said that socialism is the language of priorities. The right hon. Gentleman talked about giving free television licences to all pensioners. It is a strange choice of priorities that wishes to give a substantial present to elderly millionaires, apart from anyone else.

What the right hon. Gentleman had to say was not only backward looking; it was also inaccurate. He repeated the canard that the Peacock committee was set up in order to force the BBC to take advertising. There was never any truth whatever in it. The reality of the matter is that, in the debate that raged before I announced the setting up of the Peacock committee, there were, on the one hand, the pro-advertisers who believed that the answer to the problems of financing the BBC was to require the BBC to take in advertising and, on the other hand, there were the defenders of the status quo who could not envisage any possible change in the existing arrangements.

I found myself not persuaded by either of the two camps and it was precisely because I thought that the arguments put forward on both sides were not rooted in a full analysis of the implications of either course for the system of broadcasting as a whole that I announced the setting up of the Peacock committee. I thought it important to think through the implications of the various forms of financing broadcasting and that that should be done by a broadly based committee, but one with a cutting edge.

I had no preconceived notion of what the outcome of the committee's deliberations would be, although, frankly, I was not in the least surprised when, at a fairly early stage, it became apparent that the committee was unlikely to endorse the financing of the BBC simply by the immediate introduction of advertising.

The right hon. Gentleman also suggested that in some way the Peacock committee exceeded its terms of reference. I can reassure the right hon. Gentleman that I deliberately formulated the terms of reference in a broad way because I wanted the Peacock committee to consider some of the wider implications of the matters that they were considering. It has in no way exceeded its terms of reference.

Some people asked for, and thought it preferable to have, a broader type of inquiry, a general Annan type of inquiry, into the future of broadcasting. I thought about the possibility but rejected it because it seemed to me that a general inquiry into the future of broadcasting, or even into the future of the BBC, would simply encourage the members of the inquiry, whoever they were, to parade their personal prejudices. Moreover, by looking into the difficult question of the finances of broadcasting, one was likely to have a much sharper analysis of the problems and, at the same time, a full and wide examination of the possibilities.

Mr. Faulds: It would be interesting for the House to have information as to whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman personally was responsible for the selection of the rather odd personnel of that committee, or whether he was instructed by others on whom to appoint.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am responsible for the people who were appointed, although, equally, it would have been absurd if I had simply sat down and written names on a piece of paper by myself.

The result of the committee's deliberations is a report based on principle but founded on practicality. It does not present merely a theoretical blueprint, and one of the best illustrations of that is the careful phasing of the proposals. The committee looked carefully into what had to be done at each stage to move from the system that we have now to a different system which it envisaged for the ultimate future.

The report recognises and explains clearly that technical developments and the proliferation of broadcasting services both make present arrangements unsustainable and provide opportunities for new arrangements that will be preferable in future. The report encourages choice while preserving the best features of public service broadcasting and reducing state intervention to a minimum.

It was suggested that the report ignores the importance of public service broadcasting and the features of broadcasting that could not be reproduced in a purely commercial environment. That is shown to be wrong by the serious suggestion, dismissed airily by the right hon. Member for Gorton because it did not suit his caricature of the recommendations of the committee, that there should be a broadcasting council with the authority to provide public service grants to ensure the appearance in television and on radio of programmes that would not otherwise be financed by purely commercial operations. In the totality of the proposals, what is suggested amounts to a new way of combining greater freedom for both viewers and listeners, and programme creators.

The central concept is that ultimately the BBC will be financed by subscription, a concept upon which the right hon. Member for Gorton has wrongly poured scorn. There is nothing for the BBC to be afraid of in that concept, and everything to be gained from it. If that concept were followed, it would free the BBC from the shackles of a political haggle every few years over the licence fee, in which there never are, and never can be, winners.

If we had an agreement about the right basis of the indexation of the licence, we might be able to find an objective basis for deciding how to finance the BBC at its present level of activity. It would be formidably difficult to reach such an agreement, but one could just conceive of it and agree on how to finance the BBC to do precisely what it is doing now. However, the BBC, rightly and understandably, aspires to do better than it is doing now and to do more than it is doing now. When it comes to the question of to what extent it should do so, there is no rational basis for that to be determined by the Government except on the broadest possible general conception of what the traffic will bear.

How can the Government know how much extra radio or television, or more costly or complex radio or television, the public want to buy? Inevitably, there will be a constraint on the BBC in its legitimate operations as long as the present licence fee system exists. The BBC should be self-confident enough to be prepared to face its public and sell itself to them.

I can understand that those at the top of the BBC, who have been used to the present system, with all its inadequacies, should be reluctant to face the challenge of subscription. Equally, I do not find it surprising that many younger people in the BBC rightly regard the licence fee as a straitjacket, and subscription as a potential liberation, giving them the opportunity to sell their wares to the public.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I am following my right hon. and learned Friend's argument closely. It may be that in the future the licence fee will be an increasingly stringent straitjacket, but what evidence is there to suggest that the BBC should follow the example of public subscription for broadcasting in the United States, and that that would allow it to escape those restraints?

Mr. Brittan: The studies made by the Peacock committee led it to believe that it is not an unreasonable aspiration for the BBC, which is well established, well regarded and much sought after, that it would be able to raise the finance by subscription. It is significant that many people at the BBC, if not at the top of it, share that view.

I do not agree entirely with the Peacock committee in its view that, when the right conditions are established, there is no need for regulation, apart from the general law of the land, which it recommends should be aligned for broadcasting and non-broadcasting purposes. That recommendation seems too far-reaching. There are two reasons for the present extent of regulation. The first and most obvious one is the monopoly character of broadcasting, even today. In spite of the increased number of services, they are still finite, and monopoly has to be regulated and administered. The second is the special nature of broadcasting and its peculiarly intrusive character as compared with other media. The monopoly is disappearing, and proliferation will enable fewer and fewer regulations on monopolistic grounds.

I warmly commend the proposals in the report with regard to lighter regulations on local radio. However, there is still a great deal in the argument that there is something peculiarly intrusive about radio and television that does not permit it to be handled simply in the same way that applies to the written law.

Although I think that we can have much less regulation than we have had in the past, and although it may ultimately be possible to move to a system in which there is virtually no legislation in advance, I do not believe that it can be left at that. The right course to follow when regulation substantially diminishes is to amend the general law of the land to reflect the particular characteristic of radio and television. It would not be impossible to make changes in the law of obscenity and related subjects so that they applied fully to radio and television, and to apply a test of criminality which impinges on radio and television in a way that reflects their greater intrusiveness.

That can be done in one of two ways. Either there could be special provisions affecting radio and television in the amended law on obscenity and related matters or, and probably better, there could be general provisions which took account in their definitions of criminality and the different impact of different media.

In suggesting that, I am not suggesting a specially harsh regime for the BBC or television, but only a way to ensure that the general law achieves the limitation which the charter at the moment requires the governors to impose. I should place the same degree of limitation on what may or may not be shown on the screen, but I think that ultimately, although not immediately, it could be better achieved by a general law rather than by advance control.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that there have been many attempts to define obscenity, particularly in relation to something as difficult as broadcast material? Does he not realise from his own experience that it is virtually impossible to find a definition that is both fair to the broadcasters and acceptable to the general public?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with the hon. Lady that it is not easy, but I do not accept that it is impossible.

The Peacock committee also makes important recommendations regarding the independent sector, and I want to touch upon the recommendation that franchise contracts should be put out to competitive tender. Once again, that recommendation has led to howls of anguish from all quarters. The suggestion is that, if implemented, it would lead to the lowering of standards. I am sorry that the IBA has joined in that chorus. I do not agree that in any way that need be the consequence if the recommendations of the Peacock committee are implemented. Of course that would be the case if all that the Peacock committee suggested was a crude auction of the franchises, but even the most cursory reading of the committee's report will show that that is not what is proposed. The suggestion is that the IBA could award the contract to a lower bidder if it believed it to be offering better value for money in public service terms.

I see no reason why the IBA should not be able to adopt an arrangement whereby minimum standards of accuracy were insisted upon. No potential contractor should even reach the starting point unless the IBA is satisfied that that contractor both intends and is capable of providing a television service for the area concerned which meets the standards that are currently required of television contractors. However, all the experience of the past suggests that it would be a grave mistake to believe that there will be only one contractor who meets that minimum standard.

Provided that the minimum standard is insisted upon and maintained, I see no reason why the choice from among a number of contractors, all of whom can meet that standard, should be made on the arbitrary basis of which one happens better to appeal to the members of the IBA from time to time. It would be far better if the IBA confined itself to satisfying itself—and it would be a quite considerable task—that all the contractors who are to be considered meet the basic standard and if the ultimate choice were to be made, from within that limited group, by competitive tender. If that were done, there would be absolutely no threat whatsoever to standards.

The final point that I should like to make does not emerge directly from the Peacock report. However, it is relevant to the general discussion on broadcasting matters that has taken place in recent months. I refer to the management of the BBC. Anybody who has observed the various events and controversies over recent months and years could not possibly believe that the present divorce between the governors and the managers is a satisfactory way of handling the matter. Indeed, it is completely unsatisfactory.

Nobody seriously doubts that it is the duty, the right and the responsibility of the governors to be more involved in the running of the BBC than they have been in the past. At the moment it is extremely difficult for them to be more involved, however much they may wish to be, because the governors represent a rarefied body that sits above and separate from the board of management that is actually running the BBC. Therefore, with the best will in the world, however earnest their intentions may be, it is a very difficult task for the governors to perform.

I am not suggesting constant intervention by the governors in the day-to-day running of the BBC. Because of the tradition of separation of governors and managers, anything that they did would be regarded by the BBC as intrusive and unacceptable and would be met with a solemn, if not a hostile, response. That impasse is unacceptable. It is as damaging to the BBC as it is damaging to the country as a whole.

It may be possible to move to a position in which the governors are accepted by the broadcasters themselves as having a more positive role on behalf of the public. I do not believe that the BBC professionals can seriously think that they should be accountable only to themselves. However, I am sceptical about whether it would be possible to reach a position where there is general acceptance of the propriety of intervention by the governors in the way that I have suggested—not on a day-to-day basis, but from time to time.

Mr. Holt: In trying to define the role of the board and the role of the management, will my right hon. and learned Friend say who he thinks should impose the embargo date, after which it is considered that the general election is taking place and nothing that could affect that general election will be allowed, as Mr. Alasdair Milne has done in the case of Mr. Ian Curteis's play?

Mr. Brittan: The suggestion that I am about to make will answer my hon. Friend's point.

I am sceptical about the change that would be necessary if there were a merger. Therefore, I am increasingly attracted by the concept of changing the present arrangements in a more radical way and having a unitary board that incorporated both the governors and the managers who would run the BBC like other concerns, in which there are some non-executive directors and other working directors. That would bring the two together and would be a much healthier way of running the corporation. We may not have reached the point where such a change is inevitable, but we are coming very much nearer to it.

I have to concede, however, that there is one real problem if we move in that direction—the problem of complaints about the contents of broadcasts. In the situation that I have envisaged, it would be difficult for the governors to handle their current task of dealing with complaints if they were parties, as members of a unitary board, to policy decisions.

If we moved in that direction, the answer might be for that aspect of the present role of the governors to be taken over by an enhanced broadcasting complaints commission. I accept that that would be contrary to existing practice, but the idea of having public interest in the BBC represented on the unitary board that was running the BBC, while there would be a separate broadcasting complaints commission, is likely to be considered increasingly in the future.

Looking at the picture as a whole, it seems to me that the Peacock committee has etched out a principled, practical and attractive future for broadcasting. There is no need for an instant Government decision, nor is it expected that the Government would accept it as a whole, but with due respect to my right hon. Friend I do not believe that an expression of general support and sympathy would be sufficient. At the very least, the world of broadcasting should be given in the very near future a clear signal, by at least one specific decision, of the direction in which we wish it to go.

One small decision could be made as soon as the technical studies have been completed, and I commend it to my right hon. Friend: the implementation at an early date of recommendation 1 on page 136 of the report that would require all new television sets to have a peritelevision socket, which would foreshadow and enable the introduction of subscription in due course. That announcement alone would show that the Government were not just mouthing soothing words of general support for the principle but that they were prepared to start on the process of implementation. I look forward to hearing at an early date the good news that an early decision has been reached.

5.58 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): No one would argue with the contention of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) about the undesirability of the current relationship between the governors and the managers of the BBC. The whole House welcomes the independent stance which to date has been taken by the new chairman.

We are debating the long-term future of broadcasting, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. We are debating a report with many recommendations and, as the Home Secretary said, this is an interrogative debate. It is a sign of the lunacy of the procedure of Parliament that the official Opposition are calling a vote on an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Gentleman has not yet learnt why we are calling a vote.

Mr. Freud: I listened with care to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who told the House why. My hon. Friends and I want no part in such a vote. We are not abstaining: we are not voting. We are discussing this report and we look forward to hearing, as I am sure the Home Secretary looks forward to hearing, the opinions of all hon. Members about the suggestions in the Peacock report. In many ways the report is not nearly as bad or as unhappy as the right hon. Member for Gorton said it was.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Freud: No. I shall make a short speech, and the hon. Lady can make her speech afterwards.

What we most feared from Peacock has not come about. We welcome the recommendation that BBC television should not take advertising. I find the Samuel Brittan, near-elitist, idea that the BBC should use only what could commercially be exploited a totally unacceptable and essentially vulgar concept. I am unhappy with the recommendation in the report about the separation of BBC Radios 1 and 2 from Radios 3 and 4. It is immensely to the credit of the BBC that one body is charged with running both the popular and the more intellectual aspects of public broadcasting. To separate those and place them under different nets, each retaining an administrative superstructure, is not only insane but uncommercial.

It is important for us to accept what public service broadcasting is, and to make it keep an eye on viewing and listening figures to justify its continued existence is not what public service broadcasting is about. It is not about competing with everything simply because everything is there. The BBC has made no great contribution to breakfast television. I still fail to see why both channels should show the cup final. There is some merit in having the Eurovision song contest and the Miss World contest switched year and year about, but, from my memory as a sports writer covering the Olympics, the organised events of boxing, judo and weightlifting were nothing compared to the impromptu battles between BBC and ITV cameramen trying to take pictures of the same event.

We are rather in favour of pay television, because it might well provide a widening of opportunities for independent producers who will be unhampered by the cosy union rules which currently confine programme making to hugely expensive ventures. Channel 4 has shown that that is not essential for good television. Pay TV will help to target programmes to specific sections of society, and that will be welcomed by advertisers. We expect pay television, and specifically the amounts to be charged, to remain under the supervision of a Government Department.

I should now like to deal with licence fees. We have always been attracted by the arm's length principle that these provide, even though we are disturbed by the lack of planning which annual or even three-yearly increases deny the corporation. Indexing is right, but I am not at all sure whether indexing in accordance with the retail prices index is right, because expenditure by broadcasting corporations does not bear much relationship to retail prices. We join all hon. Members in wanting to make it easier for the elderly, the housebound and the handicapped, those who have in common the fact that they do not have a lot of money, to afford licences—if there is a way in which this will not be abused.

Perhaps the Home Secretary will consider that which annoys my constituents most—the unfairness of the current system and the incompetence in tracing and finding licence dodgers. I do not believe for one moment that the vans which purport to be able to tell whether somebody is operating a television set without a licence contain anything except three or four people in the back—playing poker. I remind the Home Secretary of the fury felt by so may pensioners about the 5p per year concession accorded to those in warden-controlled accommodation, while others, many of them poorer and less cared for, paid the full £58. I am also disenchanted with the proposed £10 car radio licence, because this will bring in very little money, be exceedingly difficult to implement, and will annoy and harm those who should least be harmed by new legislation.

We do not believe that the BBC has a monopoly of impartiality, or that public service broadcasting benefits from investigation by the sort of politically motivated investigators who published the most recent report. In Sir John Reith's day deference was considered to be impartiality, and it is certainly pleasing to have moved away from that sycophantic stance.

When the "Real Lives" trouble broke, the general public were suddenly aware of the Right-wing nature of the majority of BBC governors. After the Libyan bombing the Tory party became aware that its general stance on broadcasting had made it more enemies than friends among those who run the media and accused the management of being to the far Left. Both imbalances should have been, and probably will be, rectified. Neither deserved the intemperate outbursts that we heard from the chairman of the Conservative party and his Doppleganger, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

It is quite clear from the report that many Government Departments are messing about with broadcasting. It has long been Liberal policy to have one Ministry for all aspects of the arts—including broadcasting. We have always found it difficult to know what to call this Ministry, because "Ministry of Culture" is a title which we find particularly unattractive.

Mr. Corbett: Give it to MAFF.

Mr. Freud: We could give it to the Milk Marketing Board, but it seems to us totally wrong to have a restrictive Ministry looking after a dynamic medium.

Probably as a result of the diversification of ministerial responsibility, there is a sad lack of forward planning. By not joining the six-country European consortium, British television will in 10 years' time be working on someone else's hardware to someone else's financial benefit. We must ensure that we join in future enterprises, both cable and satellite, to the benefit of our nation.

I am satisfied with the way that we are awarding franchises. I was singularly unimpressed by the suggestions made by the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks, who seemed to feel that doing it on a best cash offer basis was satisfactory. For the sake of freshness and efficiency, the assessment carried out by the IBA is a totally satisfactory procedure. I remind the Home Secretary that we in Parliament do not go out to tender. We are assessed every few years by the electorate and that serves us well—or does the Home Secretary think that it might be sensible for us to offer ourselves for tender?

We have as good a television product as any country; let us build on it rather than make changes because they might please the political ambitions of a Government. Let us also define more rigorously what we mean by public service broadcasting. Finally, I believe that we can be more relaxed about pettifogging controls. The laws of the land, when it comes to broadcasting, are already adequate.

6.10 pm

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): I declare my interest in Granada Television and as chairman of Croydon Cable Television.

When the Peacock committee was commissioned, most of us—certainly myself—expected, after the statutory year in which the committee was given to report, to receive a modest volume, mostly devoted to the future financing of the BBC. In fact, we received a massive work which deals with the entire future of broadcasting; I welcome it. It takes us, in considerable detail, through the development of all the new technologies, which will in time make the present BBC-ITV arrangements untenable and will open up many new opportunities for consumer choice.

The committee wisely divided its consideration of these matters into three stages. Stage one takes us roughly to the turn of the century, by which time technological changes will have begun to take place. During that period, it is estimated that the present arrangements will continue, with the BBC having a slightly altered licence arrangement. At stage two, real changes in the arrangements will have to be made to meet the new technology. During stage one, the main competing technologies will be cable, DBS and, less importantly, one or two satellites from Europe.

I should like to correct some of the presumptions of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about cable television. He described it as a "complete flop". That is not so. Cable television has got off to a slow start, for a number of good reasons. First, cable television is unfamiliar to the British public. I said to an American salesman in Croydon, "In what way is selling cable television in Britain different from selling it in America?" He said, "In America, the potential customer will say, 'At last you have come.' In England, he will say, 'What is cable?' " We simply do not know about cable television. It is scarce. Therefore, the natural self-generation which comes from people talking amongst themselves about programmes has not occurred.

Secondly, we laid down for ourselves Rolls-Royce standards—probably rightly—which make our cable television more expensive than American cable television. The Americans hang their television cables on trees, lamp posts and so on. We insisted upon sophisticated technology with interactive capability. By now, those involved in cable television have reached the stage at which we know that it is not a matter of if cable will succeed but when. At last, that confidence is spreading to the City.

Originally cable television finance in this country came mainly from trans-Atlantic banks. They are used to financing cable television. Recently—I am talking about the last few weeks—there has been a surge of interest from British banks with a view to the long-term future. That is encouraging.

My guesstimate—I underline "guess"—is that by the end of the century 4 million households might receive cable television. That is about one fifth of the number of present television licensees. I have no intimate knowledge of DBS, so I am not qualified to give even a guesstimate.

Next week, five consortia will come before the IBA, each of them apparently willing to risk up to £400 million on DBS. Among the names of the consortia are those of some of the best known and most successful people in communications — Murdoch, Maxwell, Virgin, the television companies, Pearson, Saatchi, Bond, and so on. These people tend to be successful. From my soundings, they appear to think that, by the turn of the century, there will possibly be 8 million households receiving DBS programmes. That is almost half the number of present licensees.

Coming to stage two, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, subscription television, with a Government subsidy element, is the Peacock solution for BBC finance. I am not as optimistic as my right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend. For the practical reasons I shall give, cable television would sound the death knell of the BBC as we know it.

At the turn of the century, what will the average viewer be offered? He will be offered two free ITV channels and two or three free DBS channels, provided he is willing to put up a dish, which will be easily obtained through a television rental company. Also, on each of the DBS systems there will one channel for which he can pay if he wishes, and that will undoubtedly be the highly popular film channel. In addition, there is the growing cable system, with customers being offered up to 30 channels. Also, the distribution of video tape recorders will be even wider than it is now. Distribution is reaching 50 per cent. The price of video tapes, which has already plummeted, will be even cheaper. BBC pay television will face formidable competition.

At the moment, through the licence fee, the BBC raises about £1 billion. How will the BBC, through pay television, ever raise £1 billion? Even if half the number of licensees had pay television, £100 a year would have to be raised from each family. I have nothing against the system, but I cannot see how it will work.

To justify the practicality of pay television, the Peacock report quoted America. The report states that America started with pay television, but it petered out as it came into competition with superior technology. That is not encouraging.

Also, there is the practical matter of how the BBC will collect its money. That may not sound a very difficult matter, but from my experience of radio rentals the hardest task in the trade is to collect one's money, and the BBC is not skilled at that.

It is proposed that Channel 4 should be independent and raise its own revenue. I remind the House of a phrase used by the Americans—"If it ain't broke, don't mend it." I have never known a stronger case for leaving well alone. Channel 4 has been a huge success. Hon. Members ordained the form it should take. We laid down that it should be distinctive, experimental, independent. It should not compete for funds with ITV but be complementary to it. All those aspirations have been achieved. It is now a highly popular and respected channel. We said that it should be the entrée for independent producers, and that is precisely what it has been.

What are the finance arrangements? Channel 4 is paid for by the ITV companies. Last year, it cost them £170 million, about £130 million of which they got back from advertising. Peacock evidently considers that it would be an easy matter to sell its own advertising, but more than half of all television advertising comes from regional customers. The television companies have 15 teams around the country which seek regional advertising. The idea that little Channel 4 would be able to sell on that basis does not arise.

The first part of the Peacock report gives a long, fully argued case on why advertising for the BBC is wrong, but the committee seems to go back on that argument. Once again, it provides for two broadcasting organisations which will compete for funds and the outcome of lower standards will be the same.

We get the same contradiction in the proposal that ITV companies should tender for a franchise. Everyone in broadcasting knows how to produce cheap television. One follows the American pattern of bought-in films, quiz games, and so on. On the programme "The History of Television" an American tycoon said that American television will always be bad because there is so much money in bad television. How will a consortium submitting a bid make a financial estimate of the money it will make in the next 12 years in an industry that is changing quickly and in which the Government are constantly moving the goal posts? It would be almost impossible to calculate. If the sum turns out too high, the consortium will eventually have to reduce its costs by lowering programme standards. If it is too low, the public will lose. Peacock recommends that if the IBA does not consider that the lowest bidder can provide the right standards, that consortium should be rejected. But we would be back where we are with the present system, except that the Treasury would be breathing down the IBA's neck. If the Treasury saw that the highest bid was not being accepted, it would want to know about it. We are at least clear of that interference now.

I was glad to hear that the length of the ITV's contract is to be extended by three years. I must say as a general proposition that the present eight-year contract has been to the detriment of television. Granada, with which I am connected, is the only one of the original large companies that still exists, and its franchise has been unchanged. Even for a company with its stable record over the years much managerial and creative time has been diverted into preparing for franchise application. If that can be avoided, it will be for the best. I have no magic solution, but it seems to me that the IBA's suggestion of a 12-year licence, with a reassessment at half time, followed by a final decision about two years before granting of the licence as to whether the company will be required to reapply would get rid of much of the hassle associated with applications. That is not the best of all possible worlds, but it is the least bad.

Recommendation 15 of the report states:

"National telecommunication systems . . . should be permitted to act as common carriers".

I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary say that he had great doubts about that. Nearly everyone else seems to have great doubts also, not least British Telecom, which is meant to be the main beneficiary.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) talked about the slow development of cable television. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made the point that two or three years ago one thought, from the talk in the City and the financial press, that the whole of the United Kingdom would be cable within months, but that has not happened. The hon. Member for Boothferry has hopes for the future. He said that the English were not interested. In the part of Wales where I was born, we had cable radio a long time ago, because that was the only way one could listen to the radio. There was good reason for having cable. Cable may be of interest to people in the United States, but backwardness is not the reason why the British are not interested in cable television. They have a better broadcasting service than that which obtains in the United States.

The hon. Member for Boothferry referred to Murdoch, Saatchi and Saatchi, and so on, being associated with cable. I am sceptical about future standards if they run to form. I, too, am sceptical about pay television, for the reasons that he gave. I agree with him about competitive tendering, and there is no point in my repeating the argument.

I remember discussing with my Home Office colleagues in the appropriate Cabinet Committee our response to the Annan report. We decided to agree with the report and the idea of the Open Broadcasting Authority. We discussed how advertising revenue would be raised, but we lost the election. The Home Office view differed from that of the Labour Government, and the incoming Conservative Government took up the Home Office view. It is strange that, after all these years, we go back to the argument of the OBA, at least on the way in which revenue should be raised.

The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the former Home Secretary, seems to work on the principle that all political parties get it right all the time. We were wrong in 1954, or whenever it was. In this instance we were probably wrong again, for the very reasons that have been given. The 15 regional companies can raise the advertising far better than the OBA could do from London. The latter would find it very difficult to get into the regions and to raise revenue in the same way.

[Mr. Merlyn Rees]

The hon. Member for Boothferry spoke about the terms of reference and the rather narrow approach, and was surprised that the report was broader than those terms of reference. I was just as surprised when I read the report. The report is narrow in concept, and, although it has overflowed to some extent, it is still narrow in its approach. Unlike the earlier reports, from Crawford to Pilkington, which we all read from time to time, it will not go down in broadcasting history. The report's narrow approach is not very exciting. Of course it deals with future broadcasting. Indeed, no one could consider broadcasting without asking questions about direct satellite, cable, and so on.

I find the new ideological thinking of the Right as arid as the new ideological thinking of the Left. Indeed, the thinking is very similar in approach. The development of broadcasting in Britain since 1926 has not always been right by a long chalk. Nevertheless, during the war the voice of the BBC was heard in many parts of the world. When I am abroad these days, I listen to the World Service. In many ways, our broadcasting system is superior to that in most parts of the world. It is certainly superior to that in America.

I hope that no one will say that I am being anti-American. Before the Americans joined in the war I served with the Americans, or Americans served with me. I served under an American command for four or five years during the war. I am also on the international education board of Boston university, and go to the United States as frequently as possible. However, all that does not prevent me from telling Americans that their broadcasting is pretty poor. They may tell me that there is public service broadcasting, but on a Sunday morning in a hotel room in America or Canada it is pretty frightening to go through the buttons. If that is what free market broadcasting brings, God protect us from the new world.

We are not very good at telling ourselves how good we are. Our natural bent is to run ourselves down, but we do very well at broadcasting, and our job is to adapt and use the technological developments so that we can maintain the standards which, perhaps more by good luck than judgment, have been achieved over the years. The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks spoke about "the state". For about 30 years I have not been enamoured of the state boards that run many of the things in this country, but the BBC is not a state board. Sometimes God only knows what it is. However, it was given a charter and independence, and is not a state board. It is difficult to explain that to Americans.

My regard for the BBC is very high, but that does not mean that it does not have problems. I sent evidence to Peacock, and last night I reread what I wrote. As it was written only a year or so ago, it is not surprising that I have not changed my mind about much. From my experience as a junior Minister many years ago, and as Home Secretary, I am convinced that all broadcasting authorities should be independent of the Government, of politicians and of all vested interests. It does not matter what the words say: everything must be done with that in mind. Similarly, those authorities must think hard and avoid becoming vested interests themselves. For example, one thing annoyed me about the BBC when we were looking after Annan. If there was any change pending, or papers and discussions in the Home Office, the BBC seemed to become very upset at questioning.

Mr. Tony Banks: Just like Governments.

Mr. Rees: It is probably true that all Governments become upset when they are criticised, and that is probably true the longer that they are in office. When I was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I was often critical of the media. Like most of the English media, the BBC and the IBA are not very good at Irish affairs — /Interruption./ As the lights have gone out in the Chamber I shall make a shorter speech, because I shall have to remember what was in my notes. However, the BBC does get things wrong and does make mistakes. It and the IBA must learn that, if they are criticised, people are not trying to get at their independence—or are they?

I thus come to the recent exchanges between the Conservative party and the BBC. I have somewhere with me a copy of a letter that I sent to my colleagues in 1978. As the lights are out, I shall have to remember it. I said that the Home Office was not a receptacle for complaints from Cabinet colleagues against the BBC or IBA. I said that if any colleague wanted to criticise the BBC, he should do so in the same way as anyone else and should direct his remarks at a precise point. I also said that it was not the job of colleagues to tell the BBC or IBA how they should run themselves. That is where the Conservative party——

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have heard of people turning up to see the lights, but it is a bit strange to see hon. Members turning up to see the darkness. They are making it very difficult for my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) to make his speech, and even more difficult for us to hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I thought that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) was doing very well indeed.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rees: That point of order enables me to move to another topic that I wish to raise.

Mr. Holt: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman can hear me, even if he cannot see me. When he was Home Secretary and received all those complaints about the BBC from Labour Members, just as complaints are being made today, is it not true that the BBC never once conceded —just as it does not concede now—that it was wrong?

Mr. Rees: The complaints did not get anywhere near the BBC. However, they were rather different in kind.

The BBC believes that the licence fee protects it from Governments and that it is a mark of its independence that it obtains its money through a poll tax that has developed over the years. It knows that it runs into trouble because of the plateau in the amount of money coming originally from broadcasting and then from the television licence. I and the BBC know that when the licence fee is considered the Treasury enters into the discussion, and a small but excellent department in the Home Office also holds discussions with the BBC. Eventually, an amount is arrived at. At present, it is £58.

I no longer believe—I did not believe it very much at the time, but there was not much chance of doing anything about it — that the licence fee should go on being collected in the same way. We have heard this evening about the inefficiencies of collecting the licence, and we know that about £80 million is not being collected by the licence system. I put it to the Peacock committee that the amount of money for the licence fee should continue to be determined in the same way, and let us suppose that the fee is £58. It should then be determined what the total sum is to be, and instead of collecting it through post offices and through Bristol, with all the inefficiencies of that system, that sum could be voted by the House. That would not be done at the time of the Budget. Instead, there would be a special procedure within the House, and if the fee were £58 and the total sum to be collected were £X million, collection could be on the same basis as income tax, and once a year. We would do away, of course, with the £5 licence fee for those in sheltered accommodation and warden-controlled accommodation, which I introduced to try to help people in that position when I was Home Secretary.

We have the present system of collection because the BBC believes that it protects it, but I no longer accept that. I do not believe that it protected the BBC when the curious relationship between the Government and the BBC went wrong a year ago. The protection for the BBC lies in its independence, and for my money it does not even lie in the charter. The IBA is subject to an Act of Parliament and does not have a charter, and the fact that one organisation has a charter and the other an Act does not mean that there is any less protection for the IBA.

We should remember that the board of the IBA consists of members who are not managing television companies. Instead, they have regard to the principles that are laid down in an Act. The problem with the BBC is that the governors are too close to the management. Perhaps the BBC should be modelled far more on the way in which the IBA is run, and perhaps there is no need for a unitary board. That may well be the right approach.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way to me for a second time. Can he say whether his mind has moved away from his policy, when he was Home Secretary, of introducing a form of national insurance surcharge and phasing out the television licence, as he stated on 6 December 1979? He will find this policy set out in column 648 of Hansard.

Mr. Rees: It seems to be a daft idea. If I thought of it, I must have been out of my mind. As it was not the view of the Government, nor that of the Home Office, I must have been in a funny mood that evening when I chose to relate the licence fee to national insurance. Of course, those were difficult times. The Government had a small majority.

I understand it when my party says that those of pensionable age should not have to pay the licence fee. I believe, however, that it is time to bring an end to the licence fee altogether. The suggestion in the report that the ending of the fee should be confined to those on supplementary benefit is an extraordinary one. We hear about privatisation and all the rest of it, and that is, I suppose, "politics", but in my constituency there would be an enormous amount of trouble if someone in receipt of supplementary benefit did not pay the licence fee and the family next door, which had received £1 a week from Leeds tramways for the past 20 years, had to do so. Whatever else those who formed the Peacock committee are—they may be good ideological Right-wingers or Left-wingers — they know nothing about what goes on in constituencies and about those who come to see us on Saturday mornings.

The Peacock committee recommended also that those who have radios in their motor cars should pay a licence fee. When, thank heaven, I drive away from London tomorrow, I shall find it pleasant to listen to Radio 2. I am an avid listener of the Jimmy Young show in the mornings, and thereafter I move on to Radio 4. I listen more to the radio in my car than I do in my home.

The House will recognise that the Home Office has a responsibility also for the police. There are far more policemen than we have ever had, but there are complaints that there are not enough in rural areas. Does anyone really think that chief constables will say, "We shall, of course, have far more policemen on the motorways. We shall stop cars at pull-ups to see whether they are displaying somethng that indicates that they have a licence from the BBC"? The police do not do their job properly now in ensuring that the car licence fee is paid. Right hon. and hon. Members will recall that one of our colleagues in the House some years ago recited a hymn of criticism of the police for not checking cars in the Metropolitan police area to ensure that the owners had paid the licence fee. A week later he was done for not having a road fund licence displayed on his car.

Mr. Tony Banks: My right hon. Friend is speaking about my predecessor in Newham, North-West, and I must complete the story. When my predecessor was stopped, he was found to have a Guinness label where his road fund licence should have been.

Mr. Rees: If the Home Office is considering introducing a car radio licence, it should listen to the story that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has completed, instead of going to the police. If such a system were introduced, the number of Guinness lables in lieu of car radio licences would be extremely great.

I have two main concerns. First, there is the independence of the BBC. When I was Home Secretary, I ate only once, I think, at the BBC. It is not the Home Secretary's job to be friendly with the BBC, and nor is it the BBC's job to be friendly with the Home Secretary, so that everybody knows one another and everyone is Bill or Bert. It is necessary to keep one's distance all the time. That is far more important in many respects than a piece of paper which sets out the rules.

Secondly, we should do away with the licence fee. We do not wish to remove the independence of the BBC, but what a way to collect money in the later years of the 20th century.

Finally, we should all be pround of the development of public broadcasting — not that it is perfect by a long chalk. However, public service broadcasting is something of which we should be proud. How do we operate it in a fast-changing world? The report poses the problems, but it has not helped me very much in deciding what we should do to overcome them. Before the Government — well, they do not have much time—or any of us legislate, we should think hard about how we maintain public service broadcasting, with our knowledge of what goes on in the United States. Another example is television in Catholic

[Mr. Rees]

Italy. The developments there are unbelievable. If Mrs. Whitehouse thinks that television is bad here, she should see what is happening in Italy.

It would be easy to make mistakes about public services broadcasting, but "Public Service Broadcasting" should be written in the form of a notice on the front of the Home Secretary's desk. I am not clear how we translate such a notice into action, and that is the weakness in the Peacock report. Its terms of reference were those of an accountant, and it is not an accountancy approach that we want. The most important consideration is the standard of British broadcasting, and for me public service broadcasting is worth supporting.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I agree strongly with many of the well-made points of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), including those which he made in the dark. I commend him on them.

In paragraph 547 of the Peacock report it is argued clearly and fairly that "the fundamental aims of broadcasting policy should in our view be to enlarge both the freedom of choice of the consumer and the opportunities available to programme makers".

It also maintained that, with the benefits of some technological developments, those in the media should overcome the two key problems to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred—the problems of spectrum scarcity, and the technical problem of developing and installing the various gadgets, whose names I cannot pronounce—one is peritelemetry—of pay-per-view.

In paragraph 551, the report states that if those two things were done there would be "at least a chance of creating a genuine consumer market in broadcasting combined with a continuation of public service."

That was the stated hope of the authors of the report. Those aims may be admirable, but they pose other important questions which the House should consider carefully. The first question that comes to my mind is whether there is a compelling need to change or even abandon the present "comfortable duopoly", as it is called rather pejoratively in the report. The report states that the "comfortable duopoly" must be changed

"in view of the pace and scale of future technological changes."

It is not self-evident that that must be done right away.

Secondly, is it likely that the benefits of facilitating more of a free market in broadcasting will outweigh the costs? If they do not—that is a reasonable expectation—we should pause for thought before leaping ahead.

Thirdly, will it be possible for public service broadcasting, to which the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South referred at the end of his speech, to survive and, I hope, prosper in a media world dominated by free market pressures? Much of the evidence from abroad suggests that it will not.

The main assumption underlying the Peacock report is that there will soon be a compelling need for change since escalating broadcasting costs and, in some cases, vaulting media ambitions will sooner or later be constrained and made impossible by the relative non-buoyancy of the licence fee as people cease to change from monochrome licences to colour licences, and the apparent—I stress the word "apparent"—unhappiness of the public to pay for its radio and television in that way.

I hope that it is not too late at least to question some of those assumptions. Even the colour licence at £58 a year costs only a little more than £1 per week. I and, if they thought about it for a moment, many others would regard that as very good value for money. However, even that amount can be difficult for some people to pay. Surely the answer is to make provision for more people to pay in easier and smaller instalments throughout the year, as is already possible.

The Peacock report also proposes that future increases in the licence fee should be linked to the retail prices index as a financial discipline on the BBC, with its high and rising operating costs. Conservative Members understand and agree with the arguments in favour of greater efficiency. It is hard to dispute that, but we must also consider, in a broadcasting debate, the likely effects on the quality and range of the BBC's output if that discipline were to be imposed. It might increase the productivity of the BBC's activities, but how would that be manifested? It would probably be manifested in more sales of BBC programmes and other published material here and abroad and in the sale of tapes and records, of books of the film and films of book and so on. It would probably be manifested also in cuts in staff and in what the BBC might regard as marginal activities. That would be sad because it might mean a reduction in diversity and possibly in quality. It would almost certainly result in a narrowing and lowering of quality in the programming through the much more extensive use of repeats and archive material.

Those who already see some of those tendencies in the BBC and regret them would not wish to make the problem worse. The financial restraint which the committee recommends would be unfair to the BBC in its implicit competition with commercial broadcasting which has been the reality since the 1950s, as the commercial broadcasters would presumably continue to rely on buoyant advertising revenue as the economy expanded.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Has my hon. Friend seen the recent evidence from the IBA which suggests that, by 1990, the difference in resources between the two channels will be £1,000 million?

Mr. Forman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point.

In all those circumstances, it would be fairer and more realistic to put the BBC on a broadly comparable basis with the commercial companies by indexing the licence fee on a formula of retail prices index plus an agreed modest percentage for a stated period.

We must also consider the longer-term outlook and whether the likely benefits of facilitating more of a free market in broadcasting would outweigh the likely costs. In the medium to longer term, extra finance from somewhere will be needed to make possible a wide range of new services using the new technologies of co-axial and, later, fibre optic cable and direct broadcasting by satellite.

The key point is that if the BBC is to be involved in all those developments it will need to charge or to supplement its existing sources of finance. If it cannot do so, the task of doing all those things simultaneously will become increasingly difficult or impossible.

Mr. Brinton: My hon. Friend seems to assume that the BBC should go into every new piece of progress. Will he explain why?

Mr. Forman: I was coming to that point. It is at the heart of the debate as to whether the future BBC—we are looking at the next 10, 20 or 30 years—should seek, as it always has done, to do everything or whether it should have a more specialised role.

The benefits of using the direct market mechanism of individual subscriptions, as suggested in the Peacock report, should include those of extended personal consumer choice, which we welcome, and the elimination of any form of cross-subsidy from those who watch only programmes made by other sectors of broadcasting.

However, the costs or the drawbacks of individual subscriptions seem likely to include a degradation in the quality of programmes. Anyone who doubts that assertion need only consider the record of Canal Plus in France, which was well documented in a recent article by Raymond Kuhn of Queen Mary college, University of London. The BBC would be placed at a serious competitive disadvantage compared with the advertising finance of commercial television. That point is made clear in table 10.1 of the Peacock report.

On the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton), the dilemma for the BBC is that if it cannot or is not prepared to stand aside from taking up all the opportunities which will offer themselves to the media in future it must swallow its traditional aversion to advertising and/or sponsorship and adopt a buoyant form of mixed financing, as is the case in many other countries.

However, if those in charge of the BBC would specialise more and concentrated within a rapidly expanding total market on what they do best and what they know best, they could continue to entertain, educate and inform in a high quality way, but on the basis of substantial assured public finance supplemented by revenue from sales and sponsorship at the margin.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the lights will go out at 7 o'clock for about five minutes. We will, of course, continue the debate.

Mr. Forman: I can take a hint, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My final question is whether public service and commercial broadcasting can and should co-exist in one large organisation — or rather two in the current duopoly—or whether it will be possible for the different roles of broadcasting to be performed alongside each other in different organisations with a variety of different purposes. The latter model suggests the future BBC concentrating on its public service role in ways which complement the commercial output of other organisations. We should recognise the dangers inherent in that model and the political interference or control to which such a restricted BBC could be subjected, because it would then be the only form of broadcasting likely to cause embarrassment or pose a threat to those in power. At the same time, the rest of the broadcasters would be drawn to compete for a mass audience on highly competitive commercial lines, which, I believe, would lead to lower overall quality and the inexorable working out of a Gresham's law of broadcasting in which the bad drives out the good and in which the public is provided with what they are believed to want, thus making it difficult, if not impossible, for the broadcasters to provide the best of which they are capable.

I believe that the Government should proceed cautiously in this area. It is clear that we cannot legislate satisfactorily on this enormously important topic in a hurry and probably not this side of the general election. I hope very much that the Government will take full account of the powerful speeches from both sides of the House and will pay very close heed to them, because if we rush ahead according to some kind of technological determinism we shall make irremediable mistakes and damage the quality of our lives in a more fundamental way than some hon. Members may realise.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): If the lights go out again, I shall not be unduly concerned. I shall simply go to the Dispatch Box, where there is a lamp, and where I feel more comfortable anyway.

I have a special interest in broadcasting, because before I came to the House I was a BBC television producer for some eight years, having been a radio producer for seven years before that, and when I came to the House I joined the General Advisory Council of the BBC. I therefore have a deep interest in the subject and I welcome this debate.

However, the two people responsible for this debate are not present. The first is the Prime Minister, who got a black eye when Peacock rejected her wish for advertising on the BBC. The other is the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who got a black eye when the BBC rejected his absurd and malevolent attacks on the BBC. If Dennis Potter ever writes a play about the Government's attempts to manipulate the BBC, he will undoubtedly find a way to break into the old ditty, "Two Lovely Black Eyes", as he likes to bring in the old songs.

The main person with whom we are concerned today, however, is Professor Peacock. He is very worthy but he has shown himself to be lacking in judgment by offering solutions for the future of broadcasting when no one knows what the problems will be. He is like an irresponsible motorist peering through the fog—instead of pausing, he has put his foot on the accelerator and gone charging ahead. So it is not surprising that he has run into trouble. He should have waited for the fog to clear before making recommendations. It is impossible at this stage to evaluate the consequences of the new technologies. They are far too complex and distant for us or Professor Peacock to be jumping to conclusions and making firm recommendations. We should advance pragmatically and with great caution, but Professor Peacock has done the opposite, and I believe that the Government will do the same and charge ahead regardless if they get the chance.

I hope that the House will exercise caution and urge the Government to do the same. To judge from the Home Secretary's speech, the Government want to confine broadcasters to the Government's own narrow commercial ideals, which I believe will damage or destroy our magnificent broadcasting values, which are respected world wide. I do not say that every Conservative Member takes that view. I know that some Conservative Members, and, indeed, a couple of Ministers, are well aware of the values of broadcasting, but the Government as a whole will damage both the BBC and the commercial companies if allowed to run amok. The Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and some of their colleagues are obsessed with dislike for the BBC, which is a very dangerous emotion, and they must be resisted by the BBC, by responsible Members on both sides of the House and by the public. I believe that if we all combine we can frustrate the Government's attacks on the BBC.

The BBC is by no means perfect and will eventually need restructuring. As our brilliant former colleague, Phillip Whitehead, so aptly put it:

"Loyalty to public service broadcasting is not co-terminous with admiration for the present structure of the Corporation."

I agree with that, but I still admire the BBC and I know that Phillip Whitehead does, too. In addition to eventual restructuring, the BBC will need to adapt to rapidly changing circumstances, but it is reconstruction rather than destruction that is required. The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy will bring about its destruction if we are not careful. The Prime Minister and to some extent the Home Secretary are making a serious error in equating the provision of broadcasting with the sale of detergents.

Some Ministers, and their allies, the brash entrepreneurs, are great enthusiasts of pay-as-you-view television, but such a system for all would be disastrous because it would erode broadcasting standards and lead to a diet of caviar for those who could afford it and bread and marge for those who could not. Pay-as-you-view television would deprive the millions of people in poverty of the right to view the excellence of television and deny them the information, education and entertainment which are the hallmarks of British television — the traditional fare provided by the BBC and now willingly accepted by ITV. Millions of poor people would be cheated out of something that genuinely enriches their lives and provides them with a window on the world.

There may well be a place for pay-as-you-view television for a few special films on a limited basis, but there is no case whatever for pay-as-you-view television over a wide area. The fat cats of television, these new commercial people, will have to look elsewhere for their fast bucks. They must not be allowed to make a great profit out of pay-as-you-view television. We need to return to public service television and eschew pay-as-you-view at all costs.

I should like to take a stage further the argument concerning the provision of television licences. Although, in principle, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that we should phase in free television licences for all pensioners, the priority should be that free television licences are given to those old pensioners on supplementary benefit. That could be paid for by a tax on car radios. I know that my right hon. Friends the Members for Gorton and for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) are not happy about a tax on car radios. Yes, it would be difficult to enforce and it would be an anomaly to have a car tax on motorists and no similar tax on other people, but it would not be as anomalous as having pensioners unable to afford a licence compared to those who can afford a licence. It would be far better to have an anomaly of people with car radios paying extra tax which would pay for the television licences for those very poor pensioners on supplementary benefit.

We have to cope effectively with the complex problems of the future — modern techniques, satellite dishes, cables, finance, franchises, standards and many other things. We should not be motivated by personal or political animosity, but I believe that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster are so animated at the present time.

The way forward is by constructive and careful consideration, and that could be provided by a permanent standing Communications Commission. It is not by accepting Peacock's recommendations. If we accepted those recommendations for commercialism and pay-as-you-view television, we would damage the standard of broadcasting, damage the skill of broadcasters and damage the interests of millions of poor viewers. We should fight to protect the interests of the BBC and the other television companies—such companies have done splendid work. We must protect the interests of viewers who enjoy television. They are entitled to do so and should not be deprived of it by the Peacock recommendations.

Mr. Madden On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be aware that the Chamber and large parts of the House have been in darkness for various intervals of the evening, and indeed some parts of the House remain in darkness. I should like to know whether there will be a statement from the Leader of the House on the reason for this, and will he assure us that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has not pulled out the plugs to avoid the lights being focused on his recent activities?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, I do not think so.

7.15 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): The right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) will not be surprised to learn that I do not agree with a great deal of what he said. In contrast, I thought that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) spoke much common sense in his speech, which will find echoes in various parts of the Chamber. It was in great contrast to the speech by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). His was one of the most reactionary speeches that I have had the misfortune to hear in this House. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to accept the proposition that all was well with broadcasting at the BBC and that there was no criticism that could fairly be made. He was being the most pliant poodle of the Establishment that I have seen for a great many years. That contrasts starkly with what he must have said as his master's voice when Lord Wilson was involved in a great many scraps with the BBC over alleged bias in the late 1960s.

The House will appreciate that I have no special reason to love the BBC, except that, a short time ago, as a result of its failures, I derived a great deal of gratifying publicity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) told me how envious they were of the amount of publicity which I had received and which had pushed them from the front pages of the newspapers.

I had to pay a price to derive that publicity. The price was that for three years I was robbed by the BBC of peace of mind. My family and I underwent considerable suffering and anguish. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and I put our good names, reputations and possessions on the line and risked bankruptcy and our places in this House to fight what we believed was a great evil on the part of the BBC. That evil must be rooted out so that the BBC's reputation can also be salvaged. As a result of the case, which was settled between my hon. Friend, myself and the BBC, £500,000 of public money was lost. The ethical guidelines which the BBC had laid down were flagrantly breached and, as a result, the BBC's reputation was gravely damaged.

On the basis of that catalogue, what action was taken in the BBC to rectify that matter or to explain it? The answer is that the Director-General said that there would be no disciplining of the journalists responsible for making the "Panorama" programme which had defamed us and that that there would not even be an internal inquiry into the events which had taken place.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hamilton: I am anxious not to give way, because many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. I am sure that the hon. Member will make his own speech in due course.

The experience of my hon. Friend and myself is not unique. In May 1985 the BBC lost a case against Dr. Gee which cost £1·25 million, but once again there were no disciplinary proceedings or an internal inquiry. Dr. Gee was libelled in the programme made by Esther Rantzen, who was observed giggling by one of my constituents as she was travelling in a train after that case and the experiences of Dr. Gee. In May of this year that programme continued to broadcast unfairly about Dr. Gee, and it is now the subject of a complaint before the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. I shall say no more about it.

In the past few years the BBC has lost many libel actions. They have cost the corporation a considerable amount of money and have identified many weaknesses in the management of the corporation and in the standards which are acceptable to its journalists. Nothing whatever seems to have been done, and I cannot see any similar cause celebre which may be laid at the doors of the independent television companies.

We must analyse why the BBC seems to be peculiarly susceptible to the failures and weaknesses identified by our cases. The main reason for this weakness was identified by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South. It is that the BBC considers itself infallible and thinks that it never makes mistakes. The BBC is the reverse of that, and the truth of the matter is that the BBC is out of control. It is too big and too diverse in its operations. Its constitution is archaic and anachronistic, and it is all tied up with the question of funding.

The management at the top level of the BBC appears to me to be weak, ineffective and incompetent. The managers are far too frightened of the National Union of Journalists' threat to pull out the plugs if they attempt to discipline any journalist for whatever cause. That constitutes weak management.

On the other hand, there are some journalists—I do not wish to damn everybody—probably not more than a small minority, who do disproportionate damage to the corporation's reputation. There are a great many journalists working for the BBC—but not only for the BBC — who have an armour-plated arrogance, which leads to recklessness because they think that they will never have to explain the programmes that they make and will never be examined in minute detail on what they have had to say. They are prepared to fight for injustice and to defend their lies to the last penny of taxpayers' money, but when it comes to putting their own money on the line to defend their own reputation they are not prepared to risk that.

Mr. Julian Critchley (Aldershot): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I am sorry. I did not give way to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). I must be fair if I am accusing the BBC of being unfair. It would be improper if I were to be inconsistent.

The governors of the BBC are supposed to be the representatives of the public interest. In the past—and this will probably happen in the future — they have displayed a stunning ineffectiveness, which is tied up to some extent with the nature of the individuals who are made governors, and to a greater extent with the nature of the office itself, which is part-time. Most governors do not come to the corporation with the necessary experience and weight to counterbalance the management in the BBC. All the evidence is that they are often hoodwinked.

Let me take as an example the current fracas over the complaints of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in his other capacity as chairman of the Conservative party, about the Libyan reporting, on which I intend to make no comment. Did the governors meet at any stage to discuss their response to his criticisms? We have not yet had the answer to that question——

Mr. Corbett: We have.

Mr. Hamilton: The BBC made a response. It would be interesting to know the way in which the BBC management collected the opinions of the governors on that issue. In the case of the libel action of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood and myself, did the BBC seek the opinion of counsel, for example? I understand that the BBC was given less than a 40 per cent. chance of winning on a good day with a happy judge. No commercial organisation would go into court with such an opinion.

The problem was identified recently in The Independent by William Rees-Mogg, the former vice-chairman of the governors of the BBC, who said:

"there are whole systems of communication inside the Corporation to which they have no access. They issue policy instructions which are solemnly noted and as solemnly disregarded."

That is what I think has happened in this case. The truth is that we have a constitutional structure in the BBC which was fit for the period between 1930 and 1950, before competition was introduced to broadcasting, but which is wholly unsuited for the different times in which we live today. In those days, perhaps television journalists were more scrupulous than they are today and the BBC was more of a national institution.

Politicians should not fear criticism or mockery, but that criticism and mockery must be placed firmly on the bedrock of truth. My objection is that so often in current affairs programmes the bedrock of truth is not there. That economy with the truth, to be complimentary about journalists who have been guilty of infractions of the BBC code, arises because of the security of funding of the BBC, arising out of what is effectively taxation. It brings about irresponsibility by virtue of lax management.

The vast resources of the BBC—now £1,000 million a year or more — incline the BBC to the view that, whatever costs arise out of legal actions, they can conveniently be ignored. The costs and damages that the BBC had to pay in the cases of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood and myself amounted to over £280,000. That is two hours' income for the BBC, but a lifetime's income and more for most of those who would be faced with the task of fighting a corporation the size of the BBC were they defamed by it. The BBC is uniquely unaccountable. It cannot be examined in the House because there is no ministerial responsibility for its internal workings. I should not like to see that change, because I do not want to see the BBC become a plaything of any political party or grouping.

The BBC has no shareholders who must be faced at an annual general meeting. At the moment, the Director-General and those who are responsible for the debacle in our legal actions are skulking in their bunkers, their heads well below the parapet, and it seems that nobody can get at them. We expect to be attacked in the House and outside it for our errors, infractions, failings, deficiencies and so on. If they are sufficiently salacious and newsworthy, the television cameras are parked outside our garden gates waiting to catch every facial contortion, grimace or sadness.

The Broadcasting Complaints Commission seems to me to be a toothless bulldog and suffers from a great many deficiencies, not least of which is that a great many people who were libelled on the same "Panorama" programme as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood and me have been prevented from securing any consideration of their case because the commission cannot consider a complaint while legal proceedings are pending. There are still cases to come involving hon. Members of the House, which have not been concluded.

The justification that is put forward for maintaining the licence fee, which underpins the system of irresponsibility, is public service broadcasting, yet if we look at a copy of the Radio Times for this week we see in it a great many programmes which cannot be justified on the principle of public service broadcasting, however agreeable they might be to watch. The quality of the programmes does not seem to be uniquely the result of the principle of the taxpayer funding public service broadcasting, because every year the independent companies walk away with the bulk of the awards for quality programmes.

The BBC does not seem to be very innovative, because most of the great innovations that have arisen over the years have come about under the impulse of competition from commercial stations, whether it be afternoon broadcasting in the 1950s, local radio or breakfast television. As the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South said, quality seems to have become synonymous and confused with lavishness of production. That is surprising, because, as the costs of the technicalities of broadcasting have fallen in recent years, the costs of programmes seem to have risen, when the reverse might have been expected.

The real issue to which we should address ourselves in the debate and in the wider debates outside the House is not political bias of the BBC but ethical standards. The BBC is engaged in a ratings war with the commercial stations. There is considerable sensationalising and trivialising. I agree with the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who for many years has campaigned for fairer treatment of Left-wing Labour Members of Parliament by the BBC and other broadcasting institutions. There is more than a kernel of truth in the things that he has been saying.

What we want from the BBC is that it should observe its own code of ethics. That is set out in a paper by Alan Protheroe, the Assistant Director-General of the BBC, with several simple propositions, which seem to have been conveniently ignored. He says that basic honesty is something that all contributors to BBC programmes should be able to expect, yet recently in a case involving the "Rough Justice" programme the Lord Chief Justice condemned the interview methods that were used by the people making the programme as "outrageous", and referred to "investigation by menaces." He said that had those methods been used by the police they would have merited instant condemnation from the courts.

When Mr. Justice Bingham was considering an interlocutory application in the proceedings on the Dr. Gee case, he said that these were the methods used by the programme makers:

"the Defendants made a sham appointment with Dr. Gee at his surgery and then proceeded to attempt to interview him in the presence of Dr. Gee's other patients and without giving Dr. Gee any notice of their intentions."

He said that they wrote a letter three days before the programme went out posing a number of questions

"of the when did you last stop beating your wife variety and clearly Dr. Gee was being given little time to consider the criticisms being made or to respond."

Mr. Justice Bingham concluded:

"the Defendants would I think be very well advised to give careful thought to any criticism that they might make and do not think that their initial handling of their investigation reflects great credit on a corporation such as the BBC and I hope that given what I have said the appropriate caution will be exercised by the Defendants."

That hope was completely ignored.

We must also consider the fabrication of evidence, as happened with my hon. Friend and me. In spite of the Director-General of the BBC now saying that there were no deliberate falsehoods in the manufacture of the "Panorama" programme, the reverse is true. The programme wanted to claim a connection between David Irving, the historian who claims that the holocaust never happened, or that Hitler did not know about it if it did, and the Conservative party. It could not find one, so it rang various student Conservative associations to persuade them to set up a meeting with David Irving which the "Panorama" team could then film. It used that filmed evidence to say that there was a connection between Irving and the Conservative party, which it must have known was false.

It is quite clear from the uncut film in our case that another objective of the corporation's code of ethics—to produce programmes that are independent, objective, impartial and fair—was infringed, because it decided the story line in advance and tailored the facts accordingly. The rule in the BBC is "defame first and justify afterwards". That is never necessary if one can oppress and intimidate—a word that we have heard often from the Opposition — the private people who are the corporation's victims with the vast and oppressive weight of the resources available to it.

The BBC uses third degree tactics in interviews if the interviewee is to be the victim, but if the interviewee is helping the programme makers in their nefarious purposes, he is groomed and coaxed to give such performances as are likely to make the programme more viewable.

The BBC is also warned in its code of ethics to be careful not to be manipulated by lobbyists and the mouthpieces of groups with points of view to put forward. How was it, then, that the programme made on my hon. Friend and me could have been researched by a former Communist party candidate, a convicted burglar with a known record of stealing documents——

Mr. Corbett: Cheap.

Mr. Hamilton: —and the editor of a magazine which employed convicted arsonists? Stolen documents were used in the programme and produced at the trials on the basis——

Mr. Corbett: Say that outside.

Mr. Hamilton: I have said it outside. I should like to observe to Opposition Members that I do not seek the cloak of privilege to defame hon. Members.

There are a great many other techniques of which the BBC should be utterly ashamed. They are used by its employees to defame individuals who often cannot defend themselves. They use Goebbels' techniques. That could happen to any of us, including Opposition Members. If there is a Labour Government again, I dare say that Opposition Members will be subject to treatment such as we have received.

The answer to these problems is to restore real management control and responsibility in the corporation. That can come about only as a result of a complete reassessment of the methods of funding. I applaud the direction in which the Peacock committee exhorts us to go. I entirely support its proposal to privatise Radios 1 and 2. We could extend that to BBC 2, because public service broadcasting ought to be a sort of Arts Council of the air. That would reduce the BBC to manageable size and restrict it to producing high quality or admittedly controversial programmes made from an admitted political stance, as happens on Channel 4 with "Diverse Productions".

Management must manage and be accountable. Privatisation seems to me to be one of the ways in which to achieve that. When the BBC has to be responsive—as eventually it will have to be with pay television and subscription television—to the needs of its viewers and the people who are responsible for providing the money to make the programmes, many of these evils will be swept away.

It is a great pity that the BBC does not have a system such as we have with the ITV companies, which have to compete for franchises and account for their stewardship from time to time. That is another source of the evils which seem to be endemic in the present vast octopus of the BBC. I warmly applaud the Peacock committee's forward-looking proposals. Not all will be universally accepted, but the broad thrust is in the right direction. Market solutions are the right ones for broadcasting, as for other parts of the economy.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) might realise that we would probably listen to him with a little more sympathy if he had been less free and loose in here about other people. In view of his panegyric on the virtues of the market, it is worth keeping in mind the old slogan about the man who was hanged for stealing the goose from off the common, but let the greater villain loose who stole the common from the goose. That is precisely what the Peacock report does.

The greater villains are those whom we saw rejoicing when the Peacock committee was established. There was an orgasm of joy on the Conservative Benches as they saw the opportunity, with the Peacock committee, to get up to their elbows in gravy. They saw an opportunity to smash one of our greatest public service institutions and to have a go at the BBC, which they regard as an especially snooty organisation.

We might have considered standards, bias and fairness and what the Conservative party has said during the past few weeks through the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the hon. Member for Tatton and the Home Secretary today until we consider their own standards of bias. The Home Secretary told us that debate on the Peacock report would be delayed. It has been brought from the back burner very quickly.

The Government have already asked Communications Studies and Planning International to prepare a report for the Home Office on pay-per-view. It cannot be an objective study. Mr. Jonscher, who has been put in charge, is an enthusiastic free-marketeer who is strongly committed to the expansion of pay television and convinced of the merits of a system in which viewers can buy the entertainment they want to watch. He says:

> "There is too little entertainment material coming into people's homes. Television is hopelessly under-financed here. It costs viewers two or three pence per hour. I can't help feeling people would pay more than that".

The Conservatives are delighted at the prospect of being up to their elbows in gravy as a result of subscription televison. The same organisation has been advising on the use of the spectrum—the frequencies on which television and radio signals are transmitted — and the sum for which it could be sold off to interested users. The objective people who the Government have put in charge of the investigation are firmly committed to turning the licence fee into a subscription and to scrambling the signal.

Having listened to the hon. Member for Tatton, I find an article in today's The Guardian about the attack on broadcasting during the past few weeks especially interesting. I should like to concentrate on the media monitoring units. They are apparently objective, and issued the recent report of alleged Left-wing bias among broadcasters. All of them have intimate links with the Conservative party. The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), who was in the Chamber for a moment or two earlier, is involved. The Coalition for Peace through Security and Mr. Lewis, the well-known Right wing——

Mr. Holt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Buchan: The hon. Gentleman has interrupted quite a bit today.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman has just told a lie and I want to tell the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must withdraw that statement. He cannot accuse an hon. Member of telling a lie.

Mr. Holt: Of course I withdraw the word "lie". The hon. Gentleman just forgot the truth.

Mr. Buchan: I am quoting from The Guardian. It may be wrong, but I shall quote it again. It says that the Coalition for Peace Through Security has among its members

"Mr. Edward Leigh, Conservative MP for Gainsborough."

The hon. Gentleman had better check that with his friends. I thank him for his withdrawal, but it is a pity that he ever made the allegation.

We are witnessing a double attack upon the public service in general and on public service broadcasting in particular. The message coming through from Peacock is quite simple. When we were preparing the evidence for Peacock we recognised within the first three or four weeks that the argument for advertising could not be sustained, because to have any effect on the BBC such advertising would in particular smash the regional aspect of commercial television. We therefore decided that it would not happen.

Our fear was that no such committee once established would say that there was nothing to report. Our worry was about what it would report, and what it has argued is astonishing. It is in line with a general attack on the public service, with the Prime Minister's view of pushing back the boundaries of the state and her view that she wants to end what she calls Socialism, although we might call it public or welfare service.

Peacock's short-term proposals are not so finally serious, although we must beat them if we can. Even more disturbing are the report's long-term concepts. It has basically argued that the new technologies will inevitably mean that we must move away from public service broadcasting because satellite broadcasting cannot be controlled or subject to regulation. Peacock himself said that, like Canute, we could not push back the waves, and as it could not beat the new technologies, the committee took the view, "Let us close our eyes, roll on our backs and think of England. If we cannot control the technology, let it move uninterrupted and let us hasten its coming." Hence the argument about fixing television sets by a certain date to allow pay television to occur.

It is a surrender for mankind to say that the technologies themselves must control us. We recognise that there is a basic problem and difficulties, but the argument used by Peacock that broadcasting should move in exactly the same direction as the press moved in 1694 bears some examination. As all hon. Members will recall, 1694 was the date on which pre-publication censorship was ended. Fifty years before then Milton had used the same argument in relation to the Areopagitica. As a result, freedom of the press came into being. Peacock, and, to a limited extent, Peter Jay, also used the same argument—that we can move in the same direction of unlimited, free market broadcasting as has happened with the press since 1694.

The difficulty is that at that time the campaign for freedom in the press was a campaign against a nervous and tyrannical state. Over the last 300 years the real tyranny in relation to the press is not that of the state but the tyranny of wealth, power and riches. The truth is that with a free market the entire popular press of this country is dominated by three people. In addition, we need only look at Berlusconi in Europe. Virtually the entire dissemination of news on a popular basis in the whole of western Europe is controlled by five people — Maxwell, Murdoch and the Express syndicate in Britain and Berlusconi, for example, in Europe.

It should be remembered that human beings operate not on reality but on our perception of reality. This is the power within the media that we must examine. The central thrust of Peacock is the argument about freedom. At the conference last year, he said that I was the only one who understood the central thrust of the paper, which was the question of freedom. He believes that we achieve freedom by removing all controls and regulation and that this will open up the possibility of an entirely free market which will then determine what happens. We argued that in such a situation we merely surrender to two, three or four monopolies, and Peacock, his committee and the Home Secretary know it.

The analogy with the press is absolutely right. An opening up of unrestricted, unregulated, satellite dominated broadcasting would mean in the same way in broadcasting a surrender to three or four people. That is the end-point of Peacock's view of freedom, and it is time that we contrasted it with a better view of freedom, because this really is the central thrust of the argument.

The truth is that uncontrolled broadcasting leads to monopoly and control. Regulated broadcasting by the community is not of itself a restriction. On the contrary, properly regulated broadcasting, which in this country we have to a very great extent, opens up the possibility of access and a diversity of opinion.

These arguments matter and are linked exactly to the philosophy of the Hayeks, Friedmans, Tebbits and Thatchers of this world. Incidentally, can one imagine what the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would say if "Diverse Reports" were to devote six programmes not to examining the philosophy of the so-called new enlightenment—the old reaction, as I call it—of Hayek and Friedman, the Chicago centre and the St. Andrews school — heaven help us, the second most reactionary university in the Western world — but to Marxism or democratic Socialism? I use the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster as an example of that school of thought. That is the kind of argument going on at present.

To a curious extent, this has been the central argument throughout politics since the beginning of time. It has lasted for several thousand years, and Peacock has suddenly resurrected it again at the centre, just as the Prime Minister has done in her social and economic arguments.

We reject the view that we cannot control the technologies. Once we surrender to technologies and say that we can do nothing else, mankind has finished his chance of progress for ever.

We shall have to recognise that, no matter what is done here, we shall still be able to get unrestricted broadcasting from overseas. Incidentally, the freedom for all to do their own broadcasting does not mean the bloke next door who is buying into the satellites, because the people who have bought into satellite broadcasting are the Maxwells and the Murdochs. They have got a share of the action, and that will mean unrestricted pap.

One of the difficulties is that we are accused of elitism. Let us look at the most recent report undertaken by the NOP for the Broadcasting Research Unit. It analysed the percentage of people who were "agreeably surprised" and referred to:

"the surprise factor and the possibility that a programme which a person felt would not be enjoyable might turn out on exposure to be agreeable and acceptable."

Three per cent. of those interviewed said that this happened very often, 20 per cent. said that it happened fairly often and 46 per cent. said that it occurred occasionally. In other words, nearly 70 per cent. of those asked said that, far from it being elitist to think that things that are slightly above the common denominator should be broadcast, they had enjoyed such programmes when they had seen them. Therefore, we are arguing not so much about elitism as about an understanding that if they go below the lowest common denominator, audiences will be maximised. That is what happens with uncontrolled and unregulated broadcasting.

That is not an elitist argument. It is one that says that we cannot secure diversity of opinion and diversity of programme—be it from coarse fishing to politics, opera to jazz—unless broadcasting is controlled in this way. That is the problem to which we must address our minds. Peacock is a massive step backwards in this regard, and it should not be tolerated. It is an immediate, massive backwards step in the arguments about Radios 1 and 2.

The one section of independent radio with which Peacock could do something positive was community radio which gave groups the opportunity to broadcast community or neighbourhood interests. It is astonishing that at the time of Peacock and deregulation, community radio was barred and banned. Why? The Government were terrified of some of the views that might be expressed. They were afraid they would be inimical to the Government. That had nothing to do with freedom.

We now come to the curious case of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Peacock report is one aspect of the double attack on all public service and all community activity. Another aspect is the attack that we have heard from the hon. Member for Tatton and that released by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I am afraid that he is not very bright. He and the Prime Minister both suffer from tunnel vision and second-rate minds.

Mr. Tony Banks: They also suffer from low cunning.

Mr. Buchan: Indeed, they also suffer from elements of low cunning which act like adrenalin upon them.

The Chancellor of the Duchy was asked about bias. He criticised apparent bias in the BBC as did the media monitoring unit. He was asked why he had chosen to attack the BBC over Libya. He said:

"Well, there were a number of possible subjects, some of them would have required a very, very large amount of work, for example the allegation that there was bias in the drama side. What we looked for was something self-contained, something where there were transcripts, where we were dealing with facts."

The interviewer asked whether, if the Libyan broadcasts were self-contained, he thought them typical of BBC news reporting. He replied:

"No, no I wouldn't, and indeed that's part of the whole point I was seeking to make. On the whole, standards are high"— he might have been kidding, judging from his attack on the Libya broadcast—

"but there are lamentable lapses, and you have to focus in on these."

In other words, sometimes people make an error, so he will focus in on them. Quietly in an interview, he thought that the standard was good, but 90 per cent. of the British people did not gain that impression from the right hon. Gentleman. The interviewer then asked what the Chancellor of the Duchy was trying to do by "focusing in" on the odd lapse or two. He replied:

"Well if you make the generalised statement that the BBC is biased against the Labour party, which is so often being made, then this statement can be brushed off very easily . . . So you do have to be precise. And if the standard is generally good, as it is . . . though there is a tendency to muddle news with comment, and a tendency to sensationalise . . . er I have lost track of what your question was."

That was his analysis. The right hon. Gentleman has undoubtedly unleashed and given credit to media monitoring, now exposed as a Right-wing group. He has let loose the moral majority who can take every opportunity to be associated with that. I see that the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle has now joined us. That is to buttress attacks on the best television and radio in the world today. If hon. Members do not believe that, they should lock themselves up for two or three hours and look at some of Murdoch's satellite broadcasting and see how they like that.

Hon. Members could do what I did when I was preparing the evidence on Peacock. I took off to Italy for five days—any excuse to spend five days in Italy. I knew Italian television reasonably well and I was staggered at its unbelievable degeneration. I grew up on bad American B-movies. I did not expect to see four of them at the same time on the 10 available channels in Italy, but I did. They were so bad that even I did not go to see them at the age of 15. There was an absence of commercial breaks. The adverts cut straight into programmes. I was watching a Russian pole vaulter attempting to break the European record and as he loosened up and took off two steps he ran straight into a line of nappies, advertising soap. I have never yet discovered whether he broke the record because by the time that had finished we were in the middle of a 1,000 metre race. I experienced a kind of culture shock at the logo flickering constantly during a film.

The curious result of deregulation and the large-scale expansion of programmes—about 300 private television stations in Italy—is that they are almost all controlled by one man. It is curious that with relaxation and deregulation, which open up the possibility of more programmes, there is in fact less choice. Berlusconi has now bought into the 300 small private commercial programmes, so basically three massive commercial networks control the 300 apparently private commercial stations. That is what is meant by Peacock's free-for-all and "Do your own broadcasting". Berlusconi is one of five who control the entire dissemination of news in western Europe. In the United Kingdom, we have three.

Peacock knows the end result. Indeed, he is clear about it. Peacock recognises that the commercial world will not produce programmes of value. The report states:

"The Committee has its own views on the types of programme suitable for public patronage, and which form a large part of its concept of Public Service Broadcasting."

So, together with the freedom to have pap, since the stations will not put on good programmes, the committee say that we must call on the public purse to transmit better programmes. The committee expects a minor quantity of "news, current affairs, documentaries, programmes about science, nature and other parts of the world . . . high quality programmes on the Arts (music, drama, literature etc.) . . . critical and controversial programmes, covering everything from the appraisal of commercial products to politics, ideology, philosophy."

What kind of television and radio has Peacock got in mind when he says that religion, ideology, drama, literature, music, news, current affairs, documentaries, and programmes about science will form a minor part of broadcasting which must be paid for from the public purse?

We are seeing an attack on some of our most important values. It is not merely a minor matter as to whether we have historical accuracy in "The Monocled Mutineer," for example. It involves the type of civilisation that we wish to create. That cannot be left in the hands of the profit-makers, not only because that is the greater immorality, but because they have no vision or concept other than that of profit. Indeed, they cannot, because, by the nature of the beast, that is all that it can do. Freedom will not remain if it is entrusted to the pockets and the purses of the Murdochs, Maxwells and Berlusconis. They will not preserve the quality of broadcasting, ensure the diversity of programmes or seek to eliminate bias by extending genuine access.

The BBC is not the perfect body, any more than ITV is, but the quality of our commercial television is protected by the existence of the BBC alongside it and through the regulations imposed on it. Without that, it will be unadulterated pap. The people who will not watch that unadulterated pap but will themselves go to the Royal Opera House or the south bank will be the very people who try to push this on the ordinary British people. It must be defeated and I believe that it will be defeated. We have been suffering under this philosophy for a long time. The sooner the election, the better for British civilisation itself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should remind the House that Mr. Speaker appealed at the outset of the debate for brief speeches.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesend): I appreciate that the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) cannot entirely grasp the principles of capitalism and profit. However, I am also considerably worried about his version of freedom. He seems to think that control over what is broadcast is a way of establishing freedom. I look forward to the day when there are so many broadcasting channels in this country that we can have the absolute freedom to have radio and television stations to the far Left and to the far Right, and also in the middle.

The hon. Member for Paisley, South alluded to the beginnings of such a broadcasting system, that is to say, the sadly aborted community radio experiment. It was right to abort it because it was but a pilot scheme involving about 20 stations. Those 20 stations would have stuck out like sore thumbs. I hope that when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary considers this matter he will go at it full bloodedly so that we get that sort of variety and begin to see that absolute freedom to broadcast can work through from the little local centres to something much more important.

Although we sometimes complain about the BBC and ITV, we have to remember that most of the stuff that we see is excellent. It was sad that the criticisms of the chairman of the Conservative party happened to coincide with the 50th anniversary of British television, because during that week we saw what the BBC was really made of. I have said publicly that the BBC has problems, and may do so again later. However, I do not believe that they are as deep and difficult as some people suggest, or that the BBC is as white and pure as others suggest. I feel rather like the lady soothsayer—most unsuitably cast—in "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" with Frankie Howerd which was repeated during that celebratory week, who comes rushing in saying "Woe, woe!"

In a sense, although not in the total sense that the hon. Member for Paisley, South meant, we shall be controlled by the developments of the new technology. It is difficult to know when this will come about. The value of the Peacock report was that it brought added emphasis to the previous attempt by the Annan committee, which was also laudable, to say, "The face of broadcasting in this country will change one day."

Many right hon. and hon. Members have accepted that. My difficulty is that I see it as almost a certainty within the next 10, 15 or 20 years. I have scant experience of the House compared with many right hon. and Members, although I have been here seven and a half years, but having considered parliamentary timetables I realise how long it would take to make major changes in legislation in time to carry out that sort of exercise.

If we keep the BBC's activities at the same level and fund them in the same way, or even if we allow it to expand as it has done instinctively during the past few years, understandably so because it wanted to, and nobody was going to stop it, the BBC will be forced into either competing directly against a multitude of popular down-market programming which we shall be unable to control because it will come from abroad, or backing off and contracting to some degree.

In the 1950s I worked for the BBC, and I am proud of it and all that that means. In the new world of fragmented receiving, viewing and listening, I should like to see a public service broadcasting system in this country that is ready to fit in and that will not be decimated.

In the past few years we have seen the BBC's professional attempt to claw its way back in the ratings. Its ratings in the top 10 were going down, so it employed Mr. Grade, who is an expert in this area, and slowly and steadily, and quite rightly, he pulled them up on the important programmes. In the present climate of competition, there is nothing to be ashamed of if the BBC competes on popular programming. However, if, as the hon. Member for Paisley, South suggested, this material from outer space is all down market, like Italian television, and apparently everyone, although they do not really want to watch it because they would rather go to the opera but cannot afford it, tunes in and watches that unsuitable stuff, our public broadcasters will have to produce similar material to secure the viewers. That is the basis of the Peacock committee's thesis.

The Peacock report gives a few ideas but says to us, and, I hope, to the BBC, "Look ahead carefully. It takes time. How will you fit in in this new world which has not yet come along?"

We should have a public element of funding for the BBC for some time to come. I am not speaking on party political grounds, but one cannot justify continuing the full licence fee for much longer. As multiple choice arrives, why should a compulsory tax—that is what the licence fee is because one cannot have a television set without having a licence—be levied to finance, for example, "Dallas" and "Dynasty" which are brought from America and are highly popular? Such programmes would multiply on the other channels, so why should the BBC offer the same?

Like the hon. Member for Paisley, South, I do not claim to be an elitist. I want the BBC to spend its money on the things that it does best, including popular programmes made by the BBC, for example, "Hi-De-Hi" and "The Two Ronnies". Those programmes regularly come at the top of the top 10. They cannot be made by commercial interests because, first, they cannot develop that sort of series because of the nursing and financing needed, and, secondly, because of the constriction of fitting in commercials. When Morecambe and Wise went over to the commercial station, the programme was constrained to roughly a 12½ minute slot before the commercials. There was an artificiality about some of those sketches, good though they were, which did not occur on the BBC's 45-minute programme, because their sketches could stretch to eight minutes, or even to 12, or go back to three minutes, or whatever they wanted. Timing constraints did not matter.

The BBC's genuine talent should be preserved in public service broadcasting. I am not saying that ITV and Channel 4 do not produce excellent shows; it is just a different system.

An element of licence fee should remain, but it should be pegged to a target which allows the BBC to remain independent but which has eventually and in the roughest of ways to be sketched out by Parliament. The Peacock committee rightly suggested that we might move towards a pay television socket being installed in all new sets in about a year's time. That is very important and a matter for technological advance. As those television sets come into use over a period of five years, if the BBC would move BBC2 to a subscription service, leaving BBC1 paid for by licence fee, that would preserve the universal nature of one British channel, in BBC1, while BBC2 would be paid for.

The concept of paying for a channel is not as scandalous as one might think. When BBC first started, there was no way that individual payments could be made for the supply of what were then called wireless signals or crystal set signals, so another method had to be thought of and the licence became a universal tax. If there had been another way, I am sure that the corporation would have chosen to send a bill, as for the supply of electricity or the telephone. Indeed, we would not be having this debate because if everybody had paid for their television viewing the matter would have been straightforward. We have all paid to go to the cinema, which was the chief form of visual entertainment before television took off in the early 1950s.

I do not contemplate selling off Radios 1 and 2. As many hon. Members have said, there is nothing to sell except a couple of wavelengths. Jimmy Young can be sold off any day by the BBC or bought by anyone who attracted him. He is independent of the BBC. There is no property there for the BBC to sell, even if it were a good idea.

But we want some far-reaching reforms to cope with the new scene of, perhaps, a contracting BBC with fewer staff and a contracting BBC radio. I like the idea of beefing up the management board of the BBC so that the governors become non-executive directors. That would be good. But having done that, I should like that board to run the BBC, not do the policing as well. I should then want to see one television authority policing—if that is the right word—or regulating the public service broadcast element of television and a separate radio authority doing the same for BBC radio, independent local radio and any national independent radio that comes along. In that way, the policemen—the governors, or whatever they are called—will be further away from the problems of management and routines within the BBC, but there will be a stronger board with non-executive directors looking after the day-to-day policy of the BBC.

I do not want to say much about the letter of the Conservative party chairman to the vice-chairman of the BBC, except to applaud the vice-chairman of the BBC because when he spoke in Edinburgh he said, rightly, that all politicians and all political parties always complain about the broadcaster. But, having said that, there are identifiable events, which have happened over the years, which we should draw together. One is the recent libel case against the BBC of my hon. Friends the Members for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). I know that there are staff within the BBC who are muddled as a result of that case. I am not taking sides, but what was the BBC's management doing saying that it would fight the case and then withdrawing so quickly after a few days?

Secondly, there is the play about the Falklands by Mr. Curteis. I am not interested in the virtues of whether he was asked to write scenes differently, but I have not heard anyone contradict the fact that that play was apparently commissioned by the Director-General of the BBC. As an old BBC man, I ask what the Director-General of the BBC is doing commissioning plays directly. He has many people to do that for him, such as the head of drama, whom he called in to go to see the playwright. That is not denied and that gentleman apparently went down to the playwright's house and talked about changes, forgetting that the BBC had appointed a producer for the venture, Mr. Messina, who had never been brought into the story. That is odd procedure within the BBC's management.

It is that odd procedure which I think gave rise to the guts of the chairman of the Conservative party's attempt to criticise. I do not go along with all his criticisms, but I should like to point to one specifically. It is a narrow point, but it is important because it has not had much publicity. As hon. Members will remember, the BBC admitted that there was one major failing and that has been discussed. But on page 20 of its response to the chairman of the Conservative party, in the first paragraph on the right, it also admitted that there were two sentences which, with hindsight, drew the wrong inference and were ill-advised. The first was:

"in Beirut and in London the terrorists and bombers have struck against the British people."

The second sentence was:

"and the long arm of Arab revenge reaches Heathrow Airport."

The BBC has admitted that it regrets the inclusion of those two sentences. I highlight them today because they illustrate where, perhaps through natural evolution and style, the BBC governors have something serious to look at. There was no attribution of those two sentences and they had language which was opinionated. In a sense, that is an example of the worries that some of us have about clause 13(7) in the BBC's licence, which makes it clear that the BBC accepts that it has no opinions on political matters, except for broadcasting. When the staff reader is giving out such news it presents worries.

The only other example to which I want to refer now is the blurring of comment and hard news. I shall fight for the BBC governors' independence from Parliament and politics, but I sincerely hope that the governors will look seriously at those two issues and then many of the other things will come right.

This is the beginning of a long trail. I hope that after the election the Government will start to put in place the pegs for the policy change which we must have if we are not to see the end of public service broadcasting as we have known it.

8.15 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is always interesting to hear the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) talking on a subject about which he has a great deal of knowledge and experience. Indeed, for someone such as myself thinking back to television in the 1950s, when he speaks he conjures up many of the images of the BBC at that time. I know that he is not as old as this, but "2 LO calling" and Alexandra palace come back as vivid images to me when I hear him. I shall be brief in view of what I said the other night, but I hope that the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) will also catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that we can have another blast from the past of the BBC.

One point that I want to take up with the hon. Member for Gravesham is that an element of editorialising is creeping into BBC news reporting. In many ways, that has come about because there is too much aping of Fleet street in the BBC at the moment. I was an official of the Association of Broadcasting Staffs when, with the National Union of Journalists, we were negotiating the newspaper allowance for the newsroom. The journalists were saying that they needed to have the daily newspapers in front of them in order to have the agenda for the news. The BBC should be separate in that sense. I should like to see far more investigative journalism coming from the BBC and far less of the worst practices of Fleet street beginning to infiltrate it.

Having said that, the debate is welcome. I have listened with interest and great care to the contributions that have been made. I am glad that we have been able to strike a fairly objective balance in the debate so far. However, that is not something which is going on in the rest of the media. I must put the blame for that firmly at the door of the chairman of the Conservative party and, indeed, the Prime Minister. The levels of paranoia that they have reached have taken them to the point where they seemed to believe that the BBC is run by Maoists and that the Church of England has become the Kremlin at prayer.

This is an interesting debate, but is it the most important thing that the House should be discussing? Britain faces many other problems as the Government's policies take us closer and closer towards economic and social chaos. When North sea oil runs out, Britain will become a banana monarchy, without the benefit of the bananas. There are many things that we could be discussing, but we seem to be discussing one of the few British institutions that is a success story and is recognised as such all round the world. This is an interesting debate, but it cannot be the most important issue that faces the House or the country today.

The real crime that the BBC has committed in the eyes of the Government is not the crime of bias. We all have our feelings about bias in the BBC. Many of us on the Left regard the BBC as biased against the Left—and that was certainly true during the miners' strike. The real crime of the BBC in the eyes of the Government is that it is a public corporation. The Government are opposed to the public sector, whatever the body and whatever its social and economic worth. Therefore, we are talking not about careful consideration of the BBC in terms of its quality and social standing but about attacking a public corporation because the Prime Minister finds it objectionable on ideological grounds.

No doubt the Prime Minister and the chairman of the Conservative party would like to see the BBC as slavishly loyal to them as The Sun, the Daily Mail, the Daily Express, The Times, the Daily Telegraph and so on are. Many other people would prefer some objectivity in the news and reporting of current affairs. For all its faults, we are nearer to that objectivity in news reporting and current affairs with the BBC than we are with the mad dogs of Fleet street and Wapping.

It is obvious that the Government were disappointed with the outcome of the Peacock committee. Perhaps that does not include all the Government. I detected from what the Home Secretary said that he viewed with some suspicion the opinions of Peacock and will treat them with circumspection. There is sufficient feeling within both the House and the country for no or very few changes to come about in the BBC as a result of Peacock. On this occasion, I would be on the side of those advising caution.

Peacock did not deliver to the Prime Minister justification for her prejudices. She certainly wanted justification for the break-up of the BBC so that it could be sold off to the likes of Rupert Murdoch. Peacock did not provide that justification. It rightly rejected advertising, which would have been a bad choice. Many people want to choose to look at a television programme or listen to a radio programme without having the interference of advertisements. If there is to be any selling off of any parts of the BBC, and if the Government or the Prime Minister have their way and commercialism comes into the BBC, many people who do not want advertising on radio or television will have lost their choice.

The proposals in the Peacock report for the eventual replacement of the licence fee by subscription are unacceptable. I know that people do like not paying their licence fee. They also do not like paying their rates, taxes or bills. It is a natural reaction. However, for that £58 a year we get two television channels, four national radio channels, a great collection of local radio, and other services. That amount works out at about 15·8p per day. There is no national newspaper of which I can think that costs as little as 15·8p. Even The Sun, which can hardly be classified as a newspaper by any stretch of the imagination, costs 20p. The only objection that people have is that they do not normally pay their paper bill once a year. If they did they would realise what little value for money they are getting for newspapers such as The Sun and the Daily Mail. The licence fee must stay.

Alternatives have been canvassed. We have strayed away from the Peacock recommendations and this has given us an opportunity to trail a few coats. We could look at the BBC's finances over five years, which would take them away from the normal term of Parliament. It should be set by an independent review body, which would take much of the politics out of the licence fee. It cannot be beyond the minds of the BBC governors, when considering their programmes, that they must go to the Government to ask for an increase in the licence fee. That would happen with any Government, because no Government like criticism, and this Government like it least of all. I hope that I am not boring the Minister too much. He keeps yawning.

If we were to have something like an independent review on a five-year basis, that could take the BBC out of the political arena in the direct and rather commercial sense. I do not believe that the market conditions about which Conservative Members have spoken improve the choice. The BBC offers the viewer and listener a great deal of choice. That is excellent, and we should want to defend it.

I say this with due deference to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). I know that my right hon. Friend will soon be sitting on the Government Benches as the Home Secretary. However, I should like the BBC and broadcasting to be taken away from the Home Office. Many countries call such a department the Ministry of the Interior. There is something rather grating in having broadcasting in the hands of the Government Department that is responsible for police and prisons—even in the fair minded and capable hands of my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton. I want the BBC not in the Home Office, but, together with broadcasting, printing and publishing, in an enlarged Ministry for the Arts. We shall have to wait for a Labour Government to introduce that change.

External broadcasting should be taken away from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. In the minds of many people overseas, the connection between the financing of the BBC External Service and the Foreign Office means that the External Service is giving the opinions of the Government. It does not do so. It is one of the best services that we have, and I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House listen avidly to the World Service and hear a much better quality of news. It is strange that the further one moves along the dial, the more the quality of the news and stories changes, as broadcasters decide that they should shed or cut the news to meet what they see as the expectation of their audience. That is an unacceptable level of patronising.

We need to have far more access to broadcasting by the public. We have already had the discussion about community radio. Community groups, ethnic minorities and interest groups should be able to secure air time.

There should be a television channel delegated wholly and exclusively to the broadcasting of Parliament. People could dip in and out at any time in a debate that interests them. There would be no question of broadcasting authorities deciding what people are interested in. If Parliament is so essential to democracy, it should be available to all the people. The only way to do that is through television, as we are clearly limited in the space that we have in and around the Palace of Westminster.

We do not have a free press in terms of its objectivity or balance. The Sun is not crucial to the maintenance of democracy. However, I deeply believe that in the BBC we have a unique institution. The BBC is central to the maintenance of democracy. The language of democracy is that impartial and objective reporting of the news should be available to everyone. For all its faults, I still believe that we get impartiality from the BBC, and if we meddle with it we do so to our cost.

8.30 pm

Mr. Julian Critchley (Aldershot): I agree with a great deal of what was said by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). Many of the high hopes of our ideologues regarding Peacock have been, happily, disappointed. First, there is to be no advertising for the BBC. That was always a foolish suggestion. Fortunately, it has been put on one side. Secondly, it was recommended that the licence fee should be indexed. We should do that in the middle term, and do it promptly. However, even by indexation we should still starve the BBC of additional resources over and above the rate of inflation.

There is a curious recommendation regarding the privatisation of Radios 1 and 2. I should have thought that both of them were vulgar enough. I use the word "vulgar" in the proper Latin sense of the word. Why should the BBC be restricted to Radios 3 and 4? The idea is crazy.

More significant is the recommendation regarding the future franchises for the ITV companies. Many of our newspapers are owned by foreigners who do not live in the United Kingdom. The House might care to look at that problem one day with a view to legislation. The idea that at a future date our independent companies will fall into the hands of Hugh Heffner is something that not even this House would welcome.

A few years ago a former chairman of the BBC governors and I talked over lunch about bias. He said, "You should not worry about news and current affairs; what you have to worry about is the drama department." However, if we think about it, we realise that all art is subversive, whether it be the 18th century theatre, the 19th century novel, the 20th century cinema or the "box" of the 21st century. Perhaps we need a Right-wing playwright like Jeffrey Archer.

Surely enough has been said about the dispute between the chairman of our great party and the BBC. The BBC must remain independent. It is one of our great state institutions. The monarchy and the BBC are probably the only two institutions in Great Britain that work. The BBC should be protected from the leaders of political parties in an election year. The electorate is far more interested in government than in politics. The chairman of the Conservative party has laid himself open to the charge of playing politics at this time.

I admire the courage of the chairman of the Conservative party—who does not?—and I enjoy his wit, which is very considerable, but I am under no obligation to agree with him on this issue, or on many others. It is an open secret that within the Cabinet the chairman of the Conservative party had doubts about the wisdom of the American attack on Libya. Therefore, all that he had to do, if he felt so strongly about the Libyan coverage, was to pick up the telephone and get through to a governor. That is the way it should have been handled.

I suspect that the advice that the Prime Minister ought to give to the chairman of the Conservative party is the advice that Mr. Attlee gave to Harold Laski—that on this issue, if on no other,

"a period of silence would be welcome."

8.33 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I begin by declaring an interest. I have a very close association with the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technician, to which a few hon. Members on both sides of the House belong.

Before I turn specifically to the Peacock report, one essential point needs to be made, and I am glad that the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) has made it. It is the duty of this House to uphold absolutely the independence and impartiality of the BBC. It has an absolute right to tell the truth, no matter how unpalatable that truth may be, to any political party or to any Government, and to tell it interestingly and somtimes graphically. That is where, sometimes, the BBC may be open to criticism. Criticism can always to justified, but pressure is not justified. During the past few months the chairman of the Conservative party has been placing undue pressure, because of an imminent election, on the BBC. That is unacceptable. This House must uphold the impartiality and independence of the BBC.

The Peacock report has provided us with an opportunity to examine many of its specific recommendations and also to examine the general issue of the future of broadcasting in this country. I give a warm welcome to the rejection by the Peacock report of advertising on the BBC. Quite rightly the committee came to the conclusion that the pool of available advertising revenue is limited and that the imposition of advertising on the BBC would be detrimental to the existing independent television channels. That conclusion is completely valid and I welcome it. I sense that the Government have accepted that recommendation, although they have to say that they are keeping an open mind.

Also, we must acknowledge that the licence fee cannot and must not be unlimited. It cannot continue to rise for ever. I favour a standard licence fee, from which pensioners would be excluded, that would be topped up and complemented by funding from general taxation. That would have to be established by a mechanism that was independent of political debate between the parties in this House. It would be difficult to achieve such a mechanism, but that route would provide the best and the most suitable and progressive form of funding for the BBC.

Certain immediate and short-term issues arising out of Peacock and also out of the Home Secretary's speech today pose some important questions. Peacock proposed, though it was not a unanimous recommendation, that Radios 1 and 2 should be privatised and funded by advertising. Today the Home Secretary hinted that this issue is likely to be addressed in the Green Paper on radio, which is expected within the next few months.

If Radios 1 and 2 are to be privatised and funded by advertising, we have to make exactly the same point about the available radio advertising income as Peacock makes about television. Peacock tries to establish a quantum leap into a different generation of advertising that might be generated by the establishment of advertising on Radios 1 and 2. I do not believe that that would happen. There is a limited pool of available radio advertising, just as there is a limited pool of available television advertising. The imposition of advertising on Radios 1 and 2 would have a deleterious effect on independent local radio, which at present is funded by advertising revenue. It would also have a deleterious effect on the remaining programmes that are broadcast by the BBC. That point has already been made and does not need to be greatly stressed.

We are entitled to ask the Minister of State, who is to reply to the debate, whether these proposals will be considered in the Green Paper and, if they are to be considered, what time scale the Government will seek to propose for the privatisation of Radios 1 and 2. The Government are playing their cards close to the chest on this issue and I hope that they will come forward with rather more information before the end of the debate.

The other related issue raised by Peacock and by the Government in their first response to the report is the proposed extension of television franchises for — if I heard the Home Secretary correctly — three years. In principle I have no specific objection to the extension of the existing franchises for a limited period. Nevertheless, we are surely entitled to ask how rapidly decisions will be made on whether or not changes to the franchise system should be adopted.

The Peacock proposal is for selling to the highest bidder, but the minimum standards point raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) does not offer any real protection from competing operations. Going for the highest bidder will not necessarily present us with the best mixture of programming, style, content, educational and current affairs programmes, and we need such a mixture if we are to have good and decent television from the independent channels. I would be worried if that were in the Government's mind and if it were the real reason behind an immediate extension of the existing franchises. I am powerfully opposed to the Government going in that direction.

The major proposal in Peacock is the one for subscription television. The proposal is that a much freer market should be allowed in the availability of television programmes. The principle behind that is a perfectly valid and honourable desire for wider choice for the consumer, and surely we all support that. In addition, there is an entirely mistaken assumption that choice comes from the freest possible commercial market. We must challenge that assumption.

There is an illogicality in what Peacock recommends, because stage 2 of the forward-looking proposals says that we should have independent television still financed by advertising revenue and, therefore, free at the point of delivery to the consumer. It also says that side by side with that we should have subscription television provided by the BBC, for which people will have to pay hour by hour to watch. We do not need a free market economist to tell us that people's instant reaction will be to watch the free channel rather than the one for which they have to pay. The impact on BBC income would be disastrous, and if that proposal is adopted I fear for the long-term future of the BBC. It would not be logical to implement that recommendation. I hope that the Government will not choose the road of subscription television, but if they do they should introduce it not piecemeal for one channel or for a couple of channels, but simultaneously for all channels.

There are many flaws in the principle of free market, free-for-all competition for the provision of television, and that is the principle that underlies Peacock. Of course, it fits in perfectly with much of the Government's philosophy, and for that reason I can see why it may be attractive to the Government. The first flaw is that it will discriminate against the poor, the unemployed and pensioners if they have to pay to watch television. Such people spend most of their leisure time watching television.

Secondly, it leaves the market open to predatory multinational ownership of precisely the kind that we see in the tabloid press. I do not want to see that happening to British television. Thirdly, it will inevitably drive quality towards the lowest common denominator and bring about fierce and vicious competition for the highest ratings and the highest income from programmes. Fourthly, in reality it will not provide sufficient income to enable minority interest programmes to be well made and provided on anything like a regular scale. Fifthly, Peacock envisages deregulation as a component in opening up the free market, and that would lead us to far fewer safeguards than we have under the present system of guidelines. Sixthly, a proposal of this kind ignores the educational and cultural roles played by television, and those things are important parts of our national life and culture.

For all those reasons, subscription television and the free market principle that underlies it are not appropriate for a good television service for our people. The basic philosophies enshrined in Peacock and the illogical and incoherent conclusions contained in the report will do nothing to enhance choice. They will damage the standards and availability of public service broadcasting. Of course, our present broadcasting network has its faults and failings, but on the whole it has served us well. The Peacock recipe would certainly not improve it.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I do not entirely agree with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), but he has certainly made a serious contribution to the debate and attempted to be brief. I shall attempt to do the same, and for the purposes of my speech I shall assume that the lights have gone out. I hope my hon. Friends will understand that, having observed a self-imposed silence for nearly three years, there are one or two things that I would now like to say and that it may not be possible to encompass them all in as short a time as I would like. However, I shall be as swift as possible.

It is common ground in the House that much of what the BBC puts out is excellent and of the highest standard, and that is that which we hear around the world. I listened to the World Service broadcast about the Falklands victory while huddled over a wireless in Lagos. I was with a number of other expatriates and we heard Lily Boleró being broadcast to Nigeria. The voice which said, "This is London", had something special and authoritative about it. Having said that, I must add that there are serious shortcomings in the management of the BBC and that is manifesting itself most clearly in the area of current affairs.

My principal worry is not so much about bias, although that is a factor, but about accountability and the maintenance of professional standards about which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury spoke. If I refer to the recent High Court actions which affected my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and me, it is not out of any sense of wishing to have a go at the BBC or in any sense being vindictive. It is a matter of speaking about an experience which, fortunately, few hon. Members have had. Indeed, few people in the country have had such an experience, and I believe it is my duty to raise in the House matters arising from that experience. I hope that the House will understand that.

In 1984 the BBC produced a publication entitled "It's your BBC". How right that is, but the actions of the BBC contradict that title. The BBC should be held in trust for the British people, but instead in recent years it has increasingly become the plaything of the board of management and of a minority of journalists. Quite unlike Parliament, it is a uniquely powerful institution. We are among the most accountable of people. There are no secret votes or secret debates here. The BBC is unlike the trade unions whose members benefit from an increasing amount of accountability and democracy. It is unlike the press or even commercial television. It is accountable to no one. Ministers cannot answer for its day-to-day activities. There are no shareholders to stir up trouble at an annual general meeting. Yet we all have to pay this compulsory £58 levy simply for the privilege of owning a television, even if we refuse to watch the output of the BBC. The only available sanction is the parliamentary approval required for an increase in the licence fee and the power of the Government to appoint governors.

The argument runs that it is to the board of governors itself that the corporation is accountable. That argument has been mentioned a number of times by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Mr. Duke Hussey, the new chairman of the BBC, was reported in last week's edition of The Sunday Times as having told the chairman of the Conservative party:

> "It was the job of the governors to uphold the charter of the BBC."

How real is the grip of the governors, that band of 12 good men and ladies true, who speak for the nation? I am sure that they are worthy and excellent people. Well known they may be to many television viewers, but I confess that I do not know and am not familiar with a number of governors of the BBC. It is to them that the nation looks for the protection that everybody agrees they are unwilling to put into other hands. I do not know whether hon. Members know, but there is a national governor for Wales, a national governor for Scotland and another for Northern Ireland. Despite the fact that England produces 93 per cent. of the corporation's income, there is no national governor for England. I wonder who, on the board of governors, speaks for England.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison).

Mr. Howarth: Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes), if he is on the board.

The former BBC vice chairman, Sir William Rees-Mogg, quoted in an excellent article in the first issue of The Independent of 7 October, which was slightly at variance with subsequent remarks he made, said:

> "The Governors, miserably underpaid, take responsibility for an organisation they have ceased to control . . .
> They feel themselves to be under the influence of continual bureaucratic manipulation, and read in the newspapers of decisions taken in their name of which they often thoroughly disapprove."

Further extracts from that article have been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton.

It is the fault not entirely of the governors, but of the system that they operate. If they are the body to whom the

[Mr. Howarth]

BBC is accountable, and Sir William Rees-Mogg is right and they do not have control, the BBC has become de facto unaccountable, because, we are told, it is the board of governors which is answerable for the actions of the BBC.

I am sure it is common ground across the House—and I agree—that the BBC must remain independent of the Government and of any undue political influence from any quarter.

The corporation's reaction over recent weeks shows, however, that it is willing neither to brook any criticism nor to take proper action following that criticism. With an Olympian arrogance as unique as its status, the BBC effectively claims diplomatic immunity. This attitude—this overbearing arrogance—is evident. This unwillingness to respond to any criticism is endangering the very independence of the BBC itself. Those in the corporation who stick their heads in the sand are damaging that which they claim to hold most dear.

The BBC, in its own handbook, recognises the relationship between its prized independence and high professional standards. It states:

"Without genuine independence, it is difficult, if not impossible, for broadcasters to maintain the highest standard of truthfulness and impartiality."

It goes on to say:

"Conversely"—

this is quite right—

"without having established a reputation for just those qualities it is difficult for any broadcasting organisation to be recognised as being truly independent and worthy of trust."

In other words, it accepts that the price of independence is to uphold the highest possible standards of truth, decency and integrity. Some of those who work in the corporation are in danger of forfeiting that trust and thereby endangering the independence that we all wish them to have.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton mentioned the guidelines drawn up by Mr. Alan Protheroe and how they have been so flagrantly breached. I shall refer only to one — that information from pressure groups is often tendentious and is a filter between the programme and the primary source. The only guard against manipulation of lobbyists is the professionalism of the programme maker. In the case of the "Panorama" programme, not only was the evidence taken from the lobbyist, but the lobbyist was on the research team. Mr. Gerry Gable, a former Communist party candidate and convicted burglar——

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Come on.

Mr. Howarth: I must tell the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) that these are the facts of the matter. He has tried in the House to raise matters on behalf of Mr. Gable, who has conducted a most scurrilous campaign, through this programme and by other means, against my hon. Friends. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that nothing that has been said in the House today has not been said outside.

The BBC has made a grave mistake in breaching the guidelines. I shall not draw attention to any more. Let us leave the "Panorama" programme to one side. Clearly, I have a close—closer than I should have wished—interest in "Panorama." "Rough Justice" has been alluded to. Those people were responsible for that travesty, which was so strongly criticised in the courts. If that had been the behaviour of others, it would have been the subject of investigative journalism by the BBC. As I understand it, those people are still in the corporation. There was "Monocled Mutineer"—the rewriting of history—and Ian Curteis's play, that scandalous action which my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) mentioned. Something which has not been mentioned is the poaching by the BBC of ITV film in April of this year concerning Princess Michael of Kent. The BBC deliberately videoed the ITV output and stuck it on the BBC, pretending that it was part of their original film.

Behaviour like that is intolerable. I shall not allude to the submission by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, apart from saying that I think that he was right, because I watched both programmes. Let me leave any further argument aside and mention that the BBC recently put out a questionnaire inviting the public to comment on that attack by the chairman of the Conservative party. The question that was put to the public was:

"Do you think the Conservative party is right to try and influence the way the BBC covers news items, or should it leave such matters to the BBC governors and managers?"

That is not what the chairman of the Conservative party was on about. He was not saying that it was the job of the Conservative party to influence that programme; he was saying that those responsible for that programme had got it wrong. We all make mistakes from time to time. My wife tells me that even I do occasionally. It is the BBC's willingness to brook any criticism that is so unacceptable. The fact that such a disingenuous question was put to the public proves a degree of malevolence which is thoroughly undesirable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton mentioned a number of outstanding libel actions and the number of times the BBC had to pay out large sums in damages. I draw attention to just one. In March 1985, the Grunwick film processing company and its director, Mr. George Ward, won substantial damages and all their legal costs for false allegations on "Open University". The press stated:

"This was 'the latest in a series of damages awards'. Grunwick was libelled twice on the same matter in Open University; the BBC paid damages twice on the first libel then repeated it."

That is thoroughly bad management, at the very least.

Turning from the political arena, there is great anxiety in the commercial world as well. It is not simply politicians who feel that they are getting a raw deal from the BBC. I do not know whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or hon. Members saw a quarter page advertisement in The Times and other newspapers on 22 May 1985 by the British School of Motoring. I believe that it is a supporter of the Liberal party, although I am not sure. That proves that this matter is across party lines. It is to do with standards; it is nothing to do with bias. The BSM advertisement said that the BBC was expected to transmit a programme which it felt was thoroughly unfair. The first point was:

"The BBC is not prepared to specify any of the particular allegations or criticisms which will be made of BSM in the forthcoming programme sufficiently to give BSM an opportunity to investigate the matter."

That type of lousy journalistic standard is a breach of the Protheroe guidelines. It is not a breach of my standards or those of my hon. Friends or Labour Members; it is a breach of the BBC's own standards. It is a breach of decent standards, and that is the problem. The BBC does that because the licence fee arrangement gives it a guaranteed income.

I was slightly distressed to hear my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary say that it was reasonable for the BBC to require a predictable income. Few organisations have that privilege. I do not see why the BBC should not be subject to pressure from the need to satisfy customers in funding its activities. I do not believe that the BBC should be immune in the way it is when it can use licence payers' money to freeze out those who wish to take action against it in the courts but do not have the necessary resources. This is not an attack on investigative journalism, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—investigative journalism has its place—but it is not a licence to defame and rob people of their livelihoods and reputations.

The essence of the BBC's case against the introduction of advertising has been that it cannot allow its high standards to be sullied by commercialism, yet the catalogue which I have outlined at the very least shows cause for concern and generates a demand for answers which have not been forthcoming. The BBC remains silent. There have been no investigations, inquiries, sackings or resignations. If we had lost our action, all the journalists would have been on our doorsteps. "Doorstepping" is an expression used in journalism. I am told that it means getting one's foot in the door, ramming a microphone up someone's nostrils and getting him to comment with the arc lights on him. That would have happened to us.

The BBC has been able to go to ground. No journalist from the BBC has gone to ask Mr. Milne how he came to lose £500,000 of licence payers' money—the same has been true in all the other actions I mentioned—and no journalist from the newspapers has done so either. Mr. Milne can simply go to ground in a way that we in the House cannot. Of course the BBC is human and capable of making mistakes. Unless it accepts that, it cannot expect to impose its compulsory levy on the rest of us.

I should like to conclude by making a number of short recommendations. The licence fee must be frozen. Any increased revenue required to fund its programme plans should be met from the sale of programmes, by contracting out work, in the way that Channel 4 does, by advertising or by a combination of the three. The board of governors must be strengthened with people who can take a much closer interest in what is going on. The suggestion of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the former Home Secretary, for a unified board may be the answer. The board must take a closer interest in current affairs. It must ensure that those libel actions which have been outstanding for three months are properly looked at to ensure that there is no repetition of the recent fiasco which involved my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton and me. Those journalists whose behaviour falls below the standards that the BBC itself sets and whose slipshod actions result in the corporation and, therefore, the licence payers incurring substantial loses must be disciplined. I hope that the board will take that action to heart and see it not as a vindictive response to what has recently happened, but as a constructive approach to try to get some sense.

9.5 pm

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has disappeared from the Chamber, but he tempts me to evoke the glowing embers of the past by referring to the days when I was involved in the BBC. However, I shall resist that temptation, as time is moving on. I have no wish to join in the dispute, although my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) has my sympathy, as I was once involved in a libel case, but I have no doubt that many sections of our community have felt unfairly treated by the BBC during the past decade.

On the whole, standards have not been as high as they should have been. It is tempting for me to say that they were higher when I was involved in current affairs. There was certainly a redoubtable woman, Mrs. Grace Wyndham Goldie, who was very tough and rigorous when dealing with young producers, researchers and interviewers. I suspect that that rigorousness no longer has quite the force that it used to have. It may have something to do with the fact that the edifice has expanded and that the interaction between senior producers, heads of department, assistant heads of department and young sprouts straight from university is not as close as it should be.

I declare an interest as a non-executive director of London Weekend Television. I believe that the BBC and ITV are, on the whole, great success stories. Their success no doubt stems largely from the fact that as a people we are rather good at television, just as we are rather good at writing, acting and producing for the theatre. I must tell my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that that success also has something to do with the structure that we have devised. It has been a pretty good example of a mixed economy. The ecology is changing and the airways spectrum is widening. We can now get more companies involved, and there is DBS and cable. All that will encourage new entrants.

It is wholly understandable that many of my hon. Friends should begin to think seriously about dismantling the structure that has been patiently built up and about leaving broadcasting to market forces, such as newspapers, books and magazines, but I believe that that course could be disastrous. Equally, it would be foolish to let things go on and to do nothing, because the new ecology will have a marked effect on broadcasting. In order to survive and flourish our broadcasting institutions will need to change, but there are three reasons why I counsel caution, and why I believe that we should think most carefully and allow the Government to take their time about the changes that should be adopted.

First, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West said, the industry is prosperous. We do not have many examples of this in this country, and I do not want the Government to muck about with it so that we are left with something that is less workable. The industry makes good profits, provides many jobs and provides the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a lot of money. Secondly, the industry as a whole has shown itself to be not only responsible but responsive.

The company with which I am involved, London Weekend, is involved in a consortium for DBS. Also, along with other companies, in January of this year, using a low-powered satellite, British programmes will be linked into European cable. I reckon that that will provide the best of British and do a lot of good on the Continent. The BBC should be given time to adjust, and it also has its own ideas for the future. Some of them may be a little bigger than the BBC can afford, but it is not lacking in ideas for future programmes.

Thirdly, the new DBS stations are not in place, so we need not panic. Many people have yet to come into the market, and so it would be unwise of the Government to rush in with ill thought out reforms. The Government and Parliament have adequate time to analyse, reflect and ultimately to propose changes that will, I hope, enable our traditional broadcasting organisations to adapt successfully.

Consequently, I urge my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary not to rush into the idea of abolishing the present licence system that finances the BBC and to make it wholly dependent on advertising. I am shocked that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) should suggest a subscription. I can think of no evidence to show that a large national broadcasting corporation, which covers a wide spectrum of broadcasting, can be financed by subscription. It is the sort of begging bowl, low-powered broadcasting system that is found in the United States, and I cannot see how it will do the BBC any good.

It seems that the public do not resent the licence fee, but they may as DBS and cable television proliferate. When that time arrives, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, with the BBC, will have ready and waiting other means that will supplement the licence fee, including pay TV.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary not to scrap the present method of applying for commercial franchises by substituting for it an auction. I shall not develop that argument, because the weaknesses of the Peacock committee's proposals have been adequately exposed during the debate. It is a bad idea for one basic reason: it will weaken the public service feature of commercial television. With this in mind, I hope that my right hon. Friend will be careful about severing the links of the commercial contractors with Channel 4. That may give greater independence to Channel 4, but to sever all links would be a serious step to take. The present link enables popular programming to feed minority programmes. London Weekend has proposed a long programme on the trial of Lee Harvey Oswald and the entire programme will be broadcast on Sunday afternoon by Channel 4.

I suspect that the linking of popular programmes with minority programmes is one reason why the BBC is so popular. The licence system is more successful than any other I know in combining popular and minority tastes at peak viewing times, and I would not want to see that unique element disappear.

More positively, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will embrace the Peacock proposal to increase the proportion of programming made by independent producers. This should help to keep costs down and encourage new talent and innovation. I welcome my right hon. Friend's intention to continue to welcome the participation of new consortia in broadcasting by satellite.

I am far from happy about my right hon. Friend's proposals to privatise Radio 1——

Mr. Hurd: That is one of the Peacock committee's proposals.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I am sorry. Yes, I understand that. Those who are involved in local radio have a tough enough time anyway without having that extra burden to bear.

I conclude by saying that I am glad to see my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on the Front Bench. I urge him to accept change in a manner that will enable the best of our excellent broadcasting traditions to be carried forward into the next century. It would be a pity if they were buried by new technology.

9.12 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The last occasion on which I was able to speak on television licensing was in the last Adjournment debate on a Friday before the House went into recess. On that occasion I had the company of a duty Minister, a duty Whip and the duty Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall repeat this evening some of the comments that I made on that occasion, but I want to make it clear that they are what I said previously and do not constitute second sight.

I am in favour of the abolition of the television licence, but there is a danger that the anomalous position in which we find ourselves — further exclusion will only make things more difficult—will lead to far greater problems. I have not yet come to a conclusion on how the licence system should be replaced.

I was delighted to know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, after he had responded to my Adjournment debate on 25 May, when he said that nothing would be done about television licensing, was reported in The Sunday Times 10 days afterwards as saying:

"Who should pay for television? The Government are considering alternative means, says Douglas Hurd."

I must have been heard on that occasion, if not read very widely.

I find from my own researches into television licensing that some extraordinary statements are made, especially about the elderly and the disabled. As the law stands, an elderly person can have his television supplied and television licence paid for by his local authority.

Mr. Allen McKay: That is rubbish.

Mr. Holt: If hon. Members wish to dispute that, they should take note that I am referring to House of Commons research note No. 105, which states:

"Local authorities have the power under the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 to make arrangements for promoting the welfare of old people. According to a written answer in 1973, this covers the provision of television and licences for elderly people, although the extent to which the provision is made is a matter for the individual local authority."

It is not untrue unless the House of Commons Library has produced a false research note. I say to those who suggest that it is untrue that the people of Rotherham have been especially well supplied as a consequence of that. When I obtained the research notes, 18,493 people had been helped, of whom 12,726 lived in Rotherham. They all received a £7 subsidy towards their television licences.

Mr. McKay: That is a Labour council.

Mr. Holt: I am not suggesting that it was not. My argument is that provisions exist within the law to make the abolishing of licences unnecessary.

Mr. McKay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Holt: No, I shall not give way because I have waited for six hours to speak. How long has the hon. Gentleman waited?

I wish to develop further the value-for-money argument—whether we are receiving what we should from the BBC. For some considerable time, standards have been dropping. I must defend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in carrying out his duties. It was not the imagination of the entire Conservative party that caused everyone to write letters to the BBC or to Conservative Members to complain about bias. One need only read the media monitoring report which has just been published——

Mr. Corbett: That is neutral, is it?

Mr. Holt: I am not suggesting for one moment that it is neutral. It identifies the cases where there is bias to the Left and to the Right. Even if the report is not as entirely accurate as it should be, we should not place the BBC under a microscope in that way to discern whether there is bias. The report alleges that 94 per cent. of programmes such as "Open Space" have a Left-wing bias. That is not even-handed. Then it suggested that "TV Eye" on ITV was biased. According to the report, none of the programmes is biased in favour of the Right.

Something must be wrong and we must consider what it is. Perhaps it is the management of the BBC, which is in the hands of Mr. Alasdair Milne. I refer specifically to the Ian Curteis play. Yesterday, I had the opportunity of meeting Mr. Curteis after corresponding with him. Therefore, I obtained full details about what has happened with his play. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) said that he had heard allegations that Mr. Milne had commissioned the play, although he had no evidence of that. I have evidence because Mr. Milne wrote a letter to me on 14 November which states:

"Ian was commissioned to write a play by me in the summer of 1983 and took rather longer to finish it than was expected."

It is alleged that Mr. Curteis was late in finishing his play, but he asserts that he was dissuaded from continuing his play at the time of a dispute between the BBC and the Ministry of Defence. Consequently, the play was not completed by the commissioned date of 31 December 1983. Mr. Curteis was not asked to recommence writing it until July 1985. The play is now complete, but what worries me—it should concern Opposition Members and everyone in the House—is that Mr. Milne personally exercised a judgment that the play was not to be performed because, in his opinion, it was likely to affect the outcome of the next general election, whenever that might be.

I will quote another letter. Mr. Milne must be away an awful lot as in September I received a reply from the Assistant Director-General and the reply to my letter of 2 October was dated 20 October and came from the Deputy Director-General. The letter of 20 October states:

"The decision to schedule the production and transmission of the play after the next General Election was taken by the Director-General in the knowledge that it dealt with recent history in a way that would be likely to lead to controversy. In particular, there were obvious difficulties in directing actors to portray serving politicians in the run-up to an election."

If that is so, why did the Director-General commission the play in the first place?

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Holt: No, I will not give way.

Having commissioned the play, the Director-General did not like the content so he tried, through Mr. Goodchild, to force Mr. Curteis to rewrite the play, which had received critical acclaim from independent people. When that attempt failed, he shelved the play, saying that it might affect the outcome of the general election. What right has he to make that decision?

Mr. Tony Banks: He is editor-in-chief of the BBC.

Mr. Holt: Has ITV been consulted? Is there a coterminous date after which anything liable to affect the outcome of a general election is shelved at the behest of one man and without reference to anyone else? That is the kind of thing that needs to be looked into and the kind of thing that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and members of the Conservative party have been complaining about.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): They did not complain about what happened to Ken Loach.

Mr. Holt: Having commissioned the play, Mr. Milne wrote to Mr. Curteis in May to say that he was reading the play. Yet in October he had still not finished reading it. If he is that slow a reader, he should not be in his present position and someone else should take over.

Mr. Banks: Norman Tebbit, perhaps?

Mr. Holt: It is not pleasant to have to indulge in this form of character assassination, but the honesty and standing of the BBC have been under the microsope today and it is from the top that we must examine them.

As I wish to leave some time for my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) to speak, I shall not be able to expand further on the cases of bias about which I personally have written to the BBC in the past 18 months, but out of 47 instances the BBC admitted bias in only one—the 6.30 am religious broadcast, "Lift up your Hearts".

Mr. Banks: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman was wrong about the other 46.

Mr. Holt: The BBC cannot be right all the time. That is part of our argument with it. The new chairman must be given the opportunity to deal with the problems within the BBC. In a truncated debate such as this, it is difficult to deal in a structured manner with the three aspects under discussion—the finance, management and political bias of the BBC—and to deal with each point definitively, but I urge the Government not to come to any urgent or early conclusions. In my view, the Peacock report is a half-cock report, and does not provide the answer. Perhaps it was to be an interim report, but there must be a further and proper examination of the finance, management and political aspects of the BBC. I am told that it is not political influence from without by politicians such as ourselves that needs more thorough examination, but the politics of influence from within. Perhaps an independent body should be brought in to carry out that examination.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I gave evidence to the Peacock committee because I suspected that the role of advertising would be misunderstood. As I had been a director of a major advertising company for some 13 years, until a few years ago, I felt that I ought to submit a paper that explained in reality how advertising was bought by advertising agencies. It is sad that the report ignored not just my evidence but the evidence from the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising.

I suspect that the only people who really welcome the Peacock report are the ITV companies who managed to persuade the Peacock committee that the bonanza of the past 10 years was about to burst and that the growth in advertising expenditure, which had run at the rate of 7 per cent. in real terms, was about to end. Reality, of course, has been totally different. As forecast by the IPA and myself, the bonanza has continued. It has continued because the old trade cycle, which was influenced by the packaged goods manufacturers, who used to be the heavy advertisers, has changed. New advertisers have come in from the world of finance, leisure and other industries which are less affected by the traditional trade cycle. That major point was ignored by the Peacock committee, yet that has a major impact on whether, from a financial point of view, the BBC should consider taking advertising and whether the small TV companies will go to the wall.

I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that if one looks at the history of television, as several hon. Members have done, it is clear that the beginning of ITV raised standards. That would be commonly accepted across the House. When ITV first came in, it raised standards not only at the BBC but within the ITV organisation. If a pay television system is introduced—I do not support it—surely there is an analogy with the press. Tomorrow morning, any of us could buy for 75p a copy of The Times that has no advertisements in it, but we do not. Instead, we pay 25p because it contains advertisements—

Mr. Tony Banks: I do not buy The Times.

Mr. Morris: The hon. Gentleman may not buy it. He probably buys The Guardian, which is equally subsidised by advertisements.

The choice is available as regards pay television—perhaps a mixture of part pay and part advertising. The key point that I wish to address in the three minutes remaining to me relates to the vital question asked by the chairman of the Peacock committee, whether programming standards would fall if advertising were introduced on the BBC. It is sad to record that only 10 paragraphs, covering just two pages, deal with that vital question. There is the evidence of the National Opinion Poll, which shows that, roughly speaking, 80 per cent. of people do not believe that advertising would be an adverse dimension on television, while the remaining 20 per cent. — whose views are reflected by many hon. Members—believe that it would.

The Peacock committee states that if the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers' model was followed it would have a detrimental effect on the BBC. Evidence was also submitted from the IPA model, as well as other models, all of which suggested that there should continue to be regulations to control the output from the commercial sector. The committee quotes at great length from Mr. Fremlin and Miss Rantzen, but these are highly personalised contributjons and, frankly, many of us would wish to see them refuted.

Peacock argues that advertisers would buy space on a programme which had many viewers—10 million for a comedy programme—instead of on an arts programme which had just 6 million viewers. That is absolute rubbish. The success of Channel 4 and the advertising space that is bought by advertisers on that channel demonstrates that advertisers want a spectrum—a range—of programmes which have different viewers. No advertiser wants to keep hammering away at the same viewer. Advertisers want width and a range of programmes.

When people suggest that the standards of ITV are lower than those of the BBC, we all know that that is a travesty of the truth. It is interesting to look at the export figures—£82 million from ITV and just £24·5 million from the BBC.

Today a great problem faces my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The revenue figure forecast by the IPA is that by 1990 there will be a £1,000 million difference in the revenue available to the BBC from the licence fee compared to the advertising revenue available to ITV. That means an unfair situation and that resources are mismatched. Frankly, I see no evidence from the Peacock committee to show that that gap will be closed.

If I find the Peacock report disappointing, I suppose that there is a little hope from across the Channel, where the Commission of the EEC, both in its Green Paper "Television without Frontiers" and in its proposed directive, recognises and welcomes the role of advertising. The assumption it makes is that broadcast advertising will be recognised and extended. That is a challenge that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should address when he considers these matters.

9.30 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): This has been a quiet and thoughtful debate so far. I understand why the hon. Members for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) said what they did, although I wish that they had left much of it unsaid. Let us not forget that the start of the affair over the "Panorama" programme was not only allegations from the Labour party, but a report drawn up by the Young Conservatives concerned about extremist Right-wing infiltration into the Conservative party. As a result of the settlement, the experienced BBC journalists involved in the making of that programme have been denied the opportunity of putting their point of view and being able to defend their actions.

I say this to the two hon. Members in their absence. If Gerry Gable, whom they bad-mouthed in the House tonight, does no more, he should stand high in our praise for unmasking the Conservative candidate in Stockton, South at the last general election as a former National Front candidate in the last two elections in 1974 in my constituency of Birmingham, Erdington. It is to the credit of the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) that when he went there, having found that out, he refused to share a platform with Mr. Finnegan.

It is a pity that the debate has taken place against a background of sustained abuse and hostility towards broadcasters generally and the BBC in particular, which reveals the extreme face of Conservatism. [Interruption.] I thought that that would bring a protest. That is not my judgment about extremism, but the judgment of most of the electors in today's Gallup poll in the Daily Telegraph. Most voters asked to identify which party they saw as the most extreme opted — quite rightly — for the Conservatives. Fifty-two per cent. of them said that the Conservatives were extreme and 34 per cent. saw them as moderate, a word which the chairman of the Tory party, if he were here, would instantly reject. Thank you, Tory party chairman. It will surprise no one that his lone rantings have shown up so dramatically and quickly in the polls.

The right hon. Gentleman is coy about answering questions in the House. He will be more coy tonight, because he is not here, but I have two questions for him. First, if, as has been alleged, the complaints were made in his role as chairman of the Tory party, and in that sense as a private individual rather than a putative Minister of truth, why did he not send them straight to the Broadcasting Complaints Commission, which his Government set up? Secondly, if, as he and some of his hon. Friends imply, the BBC is riddled with Trots and Marxists, can he explain how that happened? Has he forgotten that until last year at least every editorial appointment at the BBC was vetted by a grey man in a small office in Broadcasting House? Is that MI5 failing again in its duty?

What the Tory party chairman wants to achieve—and this applies to other extremists in his party—was demonstrated yesterday when ITN's "News at One" came from 10 Downing street. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) said, there were 14 minutes of the Prime Minister. He had complaints from his constituents that they should not have to watch that while eating their lunch—it put them off. The broadcast ended with the words:

"This is Leonard Parkin and Margaret Thatcher at Downing Street."

Doubtless there will be no complaints about bias there.

Broadcasting will clearly experience more change more quickly than ever before. If that leads to continuing high standards and increased access to groups and interests that are now denied it and widens the scope of information that is available to listeners and viewers, I shall welcome it. Other people, however, have other benefits in mind. They see a chance to make more money and to strip away the protections offered by the BBC board of governors and the Independent Broadcasting Authority. They would privatise and let the people with the deepest pockets and purses take over, just as they have all but dominated the national press and turned Fleet street into a giant bingo hall. That is what lies behind calls for so-called competition and freedom of choice. The route that is advocated by Peacock and supported by the Government would restrict choice to those who are able to pay.

Peacock's argument, and that of the Government, is wrongly based, because they regard broadcasting as consumer driven rather than citizen driven. There is an important difference. Everybody is supposed to be an equal citizen under our law, but all consumers are not equal. What kind of consumer choice do the 4 million jobless people have? How real is consumer choice for the millions of pensioners who are forced on to means-tested supplementary benefit? What consumer preference can be exercised by the 5 million who are at work but on coolie-level wages?

Peacock and the Government want, not pay television, but no pay no television, further to deny the 16 million people who live in poverty any real place in society. It has been asserted today that we pay for BBC television but that somehow we get commercial television free. There is no such thing as free television. There are two ways in which to pay for television—through the licence, or each time we shop.

Supposedly free commercial television costs about 4p for every hour of viewing. It is paid at the supermarket checkout and over the lounge bar, irrespective of whether the programmes are watched. The cost of advertising is drawn from all consumers and puts an estimated 15p on a jar of coffee and 10p on a packet of tea bags. Free commercial television costs each household an estimated £55 a year, as opposed to £58 for the BBC licence, which provides a wider choice and a national service.

Mr. Brinton: I know that the hon. Gentleman has experience in marketing matters. Has he considered that advertising keeps down the price of goods?

Mr. Corbett: That is another story. I am not making that point at all.

We accept that the BBC licence fee is regressive and hits hardest people with the least cash. That is why, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, we are pledged to phase out the licence for all pensioners. [HON. MEMBERS: "Phase out?"] Phase out. The vast majority of viewers can and do pay the licence in return for programmes which are generally recognised as among the best in the world.

No Opposition Member is saying that the BBC is perfect. Many of us would argue that, if bias exists, it is a bias against the Labour party, but that it is by no means as great as the bias against Labour in the pro-Tory national press.

There was an interesting Gallup poll in July 1986. People were asked:

"Do you think BBC programmes tend to be biased against any political party?"

Some 26 per cent. said yes and 59 per cent. said no. They were then asked:

"Which party do you think the BBC is biased against?"

The reply was Conservative 34 per cent., Labour 51 per cent. That does not prove the point, but it reveals people's perceptions.

The banner of so-called competition as advocated by Peacock will not wash. We assert our unshakeable commitment to public service broadcasting, where chasing the ratings to attract advertising is not the main reason for making or showing programmes. Down that route lies round-the-clock "Eastenders" and the equivalent of a junk food diet.

If it is all about giving viewers what they want, we had better know what they do want. The Broadcasting Research Unit asked viewers what they expected. Ninety-seven per cent. said that television should entertain, 93 per cent. said that it should inform, and 84 per cent. said that it should educate. Those preferences do not live in separate boxes, and most programmes are a mix. Those preferences show that the viewers are not the mindless morons which the likes of the sewer Sun take them to be. Those preferences will be ignored and overridden in the quest for profit if bits of the Beeb are flogged and ITV licences auctioned to the highest bidder and, no doubt, those with the lowest standards.

It is the same with the notion of pay television. Peacock said that the decoder cost between £100 and £150 in the United States. How are the millions on supplementary and welfare benefits expected to pay that on top of the cost of the price of a new set? Among the heaviest viewers of television are pensioners and those denied work. How much will they have to pay to view what they want, and where will the cash come from? Just imagine a pay television channel buying up the cup final, the State Opening of Parliament or the Queen's Christmas message — the sky would be the limit as to what they could charge both viewers and advertisers.

It is no wonder that the distinguished Professor Alastair Hetherington, a Peacock committee member, said:

"It is daft because no one has thought out what could be sold."

The same is true of plans for advertising. Where is the extra advertising supposed to come from at a time of recession? Advertising on ITV rose by about 14 per cent. in 1981-82 and 19 per cent. in 1982-83, but slipped back to 10·8 per cent., to reach about £1,000 million, in 1984.

There are many in the industry who believe that advertising has reached a plateau. Advertising on the BBC would hurt both commercial television and the radio stations, many of which are now struggling to make ends meet, as the latest rental reduction agreed by the Government shows. It would also impact on the share of advertising carried by provincial morning and evening newspapers, as well as some consumer magazines. Peacock failed to understand that advertising is not confined to one section of the media, because many campaigns have a carefully chosen media mix.

It is suggested that there are no controls on the broadcasters. That is rubbish. Both the BBC and ITV have standards to meet and machinery to deal with complaints. Neither wants signals that the Government intend to stiffen controls. The NUJ, with many members in broadcasting, has this week established an ethics council to investigate complaints in broadcasting and the media generally from those who work in it and the public. Indeed, it invited the Tory party chairman to send his silly dossier to the council, but he has not yet responded. TVS and the NUJ have agreed guidelines for the conduct of interviews, and the NUJ and ACTT are developing a joint policy on a right of reply. The Home Secretary has been asked to meet the NUJ over broadcasting policy, and I very much hope that he will respond to that request.

Labour wants a vibrant, independent, responsive and responsible system of broadcasting, with a regulatory system which encourages rather than restricts, and which does not limit access to television and radio to those who can pay. That is why we want the go-ahead for community radio development and the building up of regional television and radio, to let more voices be heard, especially from those currently denied access, or find it difficult, in our many ethnic communities.

Satellite broadcasting, properly run and handled, can cross frontiers which now separate us and in its way make a better contribution to improving understanding between peoples. Our democracy will survive and flourish if we preserve and promote what is best in our broadcasting and if we widen and sustain the BBC's role in public service broadcasting. The mix of this mixed economy gives us the best of both worlds. That is why we want to build on it rather than tear it down and let cash alone determine what we view.

The Government and Peacock pose serious threats to the worldwide justified reputation of the BBC, which is rightly described as the envy of the world. All that could be put at risk or lost by the Government, as Professor Hetherington said. Once again the Government have shown that they know the price of everything and the value of nothing.

9.45 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Mellor): Perhaps I can begin by paying warm tribute to those who sat with Professor Peacock and in 12 months produced such a thought-provoking report. It deals not only with the central issues on which they were invited to report, but sets the matter in the proper context, looking more widely at the future of television and radio at a challenging time.

Today's debate has been lively and interesting, indeed, even livelier after the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). Inevitably some hon. Members agreed warmly with Peacock's proposals, some sought to reject them utterly, and rather more found many recommendations of value, while taking issue with others. That is as it should be.

The purpose of the debate was in no sense to establish the Peacock report and to pre-empt discussions. The Peacock report was the stimulus to informed discussion. It is in that spirit that the Government come before the House tonight. I was happy to yield up half the normal time for which hon. Members must endure a Front Bench speech so that almost all hon. Members could speak. The purpose of the debate was not for the Government to tell the House what we intend it to accept, but for us to have a chance to listen to the House and to hear what hon. Members, especially those with genuine interest in and experience of the media, feel should be the future direction when there is no option but to make changes. The questions are: in what direction do we go, and how far down certain roads do we try to go in the years ahead? It is on that basis that we have listened to the debate and shall study carefully the text in Hansard.

There were some distinguished speeches and some amusing ones. Those of us with a well-defined sense of the ridiculous enjoyed what the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said about value for money. I admit that I yawned at one point and he properly rebuked me for it, but it was not at that point. He had no difficulty in persuading me that the BBC offered better value for money than the GLC ever did.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), who has apologised to the House for not being present for the winding-up speeches because of an outside engagement which he could not postpone, properly referred to the report that he commissioned. We should be grateful for his foreight in doing so. He described the report as being based on principle and founded in practicality. The recommendations must be considered on that basis and against that interesting test.

Most hon. Members endeavoured to do that, with the exception of the Opposition Front Bench. In 40 minutes the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and in 15 minutes the hon. Member for Erdington drew attention not to the inadequacies of Peacock, but rather to the flimsiness of Labour party thinking on the crucial area of the future of broadcasting. In particular, one of their charges was well wide of the mark. In no sense is Peacock gratuitous in the sense that it is inviting us to consider matters that do not need to be addressed. Peacock is taking one view — not necessarily one with which everyone, even on the Conservative Benches, wishes to agree—about future decisions that must be taken against the background of inevitable change, such as the development of the VCR, the introduction of cable, DBS, and international developments which mean that, whatever we choose to do, the rest of the world will take decisions that have implications for us, and, indeed, that offer opportunities for us.

Why should we in Britain always see change as a threat? Why do we not see change as an opportunity? Goodness knows there are few industries where we are better equipped to deal with opportunities than in the media where our reputation stands high around the world. I pay tribute to that. It is no part of our case that we do not have excellent television and radio for the most part and that which is rightly the object of comment and congratulation from others. That gives us a strong base to be confident about developments.

But let us not be more ultra than the ultras. Let us not, in the congratulations that we heap on the broadcasters, even exceed the massive amount of self-congratulation that they are capable of heaping on themselves without any help from us. Let us keep some sort of balance, and recognise that some change is crucial and a lot of change will be inevitable.

I am sorry to take issue with the right hon. Member for Gorton, but it was a sad indictment of his speech that he spent 10 times as long dealing with parliamentary questions about the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's video recorder as with Labour's vision of the future of broadcasting. No wonder we were treated to that insight into the internal politics of the Labour party in The Independent yesterday. That is proving to be a most useful sheet. It had three attractive photographs—a large one of the right hon. Gentleman in full ortorical flow, and rather smaller ones, as is only appropriate, of his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) looking rather grim—so grim that he is not even here as far as I can see—because he apparently had lost out in the battle to make a Front Bench speech and was obliged to speak from the Back Benches, and a rather attractively rugged photograph of the hon. Member for Erdington, looking as though he had just come off the set of "Emmerdale Farm" and very fetching.

However, the text had little of comfort. What do we find but this revealing paragraph. The media correspondent of The Independent, displaying proper independence, which I commend, said:

"For the debate finds the Labour party in disarray, still in the process of formulating its media policies. Senior broadcasters who have been lobbying discreetly in the past few days"— so discreetly that they have not come to my notice—

"are dismayed and shocked at the lack of serious thinking. The bald fact is that Labour has not responded to the Peacock recommendations with a thought-out document."

Nor, indeed, has it responded with thought-out speeches.

It will be no surprise to those who have listened to the speeches from the Opposition Benches that all the worthwhile developments that have been taken place in broadcasting since the war have been under Conservative Governments—the introduction of ITV and independent local radio. The next step forward after the next election will be in our charge as well. For those who are afraid of what the future holds with those changes, exactly the same things were said before the introduction of ITV and independent radio, and, of course, it was found to be equally wrong.

If the Labour party were flimsy on policy, it became positively hysterical when we reached the attacks on what my right hon. Friend the chairman of the Conservative party had to say. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Gorton repeated what he said in July when he said:

"The forthcoming Labour Government will ensure that the BBC, as a great national institution, internationally respected, is not only preserved, but is protected from interference by Governments of any party." — [Official Report, 3 July 1986; Vol 110, c. 1179.]

That sits ill with the days when he was sitting in the kitchen Cabinet of Mr. Wilson. I have to cut out the number of quotes that I can use because I do not have sufficient time, but I must remind him of one from October 1965 when The Times reported that Mr. Wilson — the right hon. Gentleman was there at the time — summoned a producer and warned him to

"mend his ways or the Government will have to think about bringing the BBC under tighter discipline."

The Guardian, that well-known Tory biased newspaper, on 3 October said:

"The Labour Party is to double its 60-strong team monitoring political bias on television, following the appointment on Wednesday of Mr. Marmaduke Hussey as the Chairman of BBC. Mr. John McWilliam, MP for Blaydon and a Senior Whip, who runs the Party's monitoring system, said yesterda / that the team, which tries to ensure that the definition of balance in the BBC Charter and the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act is applied, would be doubled as Mr. Hussey's appointment was, 'the last straw'."

We are being told that the Labour party wants not a hair of the head of the BBC touched, whereas even before "the last straw" it had 60 people apparently doing nothing but monitoring broadcasting.

That is hysterical, but there is more to come on the interesting point about the phasing out of television licences for pensioners. The right hon. Member for Gorton insisted that this was not one of those optional extras but at the core of the programme. However, the hon. Member for Erdington told us that there would be "phasing out". "Phasing out" is usually what politicians say before an election to justify going into the next election without having done it. I suspect that that will be the reality.

The £3·5 billion that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) is to take off the rich—nobody else will have their tax increased—will be for specific pledges relating to the relief of poverty. This is not one of them. How will they do it? Is the £325 million to be lost to allow poorly-off citizens such as the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton)—both pensioners—to be protected so that young couples with two children and on supplementary benefit will have to pay a licence fee of £85 to cover the lost money? Is the truth more like what Mr. Blunkett, poor soul, who let the cat out of the bag and was firmly sat on and squashed, suggested? The electorate will not be taken in by that.

Mr. Allen McKay rose——

Mr. Mellor: No; I do not have time to give way.

We have serious business to do. The development of cable is an exciting prospect and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said, has many opportunities. We know that within the next few weeks the IBA will announce the allocations, from the five applications that it has received, for three DBS channels, which proves the wisdom of our policy of allowing the market to sort out these things. After the next election, if the House approves the new Bill, we shall be in a position to extend the franchises for three years to allow ITV companies to take crucial decisions on the future of the independent television system.

A group of consultants is looking into the prospects of subscription, about which we have had a variety of interesting comments. We understand the drawbacks of subscription. We are not saying that we are committed to it but we are saying that the idea must be tested and that process will be taken further by those reports.

I particularly commend the principled speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman). He urged us not to rush ahead impelled by technological determinism. It is not that. We do not see ourselves as driven by technological change where we are like, was it M. Roland, the French revolutionary who, as the mob was rampaging through Paris, stood on the sidelines and said, "I must follow them for I am their leader." We do not see technological change in that way.

However, technological change will not be denied. People want the VCR and the satellite. We have to find a system of regulation that best enables us to retain all that is best in British broadcasting and ensure that we move on, as we have always done, to a better era. In that spirit we, and we alone, are tackling the problem.

Question put, That this House do now adjourn:—

Weston-super-Mare and Banwell (Roads)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

10.12 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for coming to the House to answer this debate.

When I first became the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare, one of my first endeavours concerned the erection of our new hospital. After having several Adjournment debates, I am happy to say that that hospital is now full of patients. I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind that he will not have to meet me too often on this subject if he can say something profitable to me tonight.

The problem of the Banwell bypass is of long-standing concern. The village, which sits on the junction of two A roads, was, of course, built in the horse and cart age. It provides a feeder road for a lot of traffic leaving on one side of Weston-super-Mare. It is worth bearing in mind that a seaside town is unique in one respect. Only half the area around the town is available to move in and out of, for obvious geographical reasons. The A371, which runs through Banwell, is a crucial road for people who wish to move in and out of the town. In addition, it is on the route used by much of the lorry traffic that emanates from that great source of road stone in our part of the world, the Mendip quarries. The problem is exacerbated by that.

In his last letter to me on this subject, the county surveyor said:

"The County Council shares your concern about traffic conditions in Banwell and Winscombe and has retained proposals to bypass both communities within the First Alteration to the Structure Plan. Unfortunately it has only been possible within the resources available to programme the Banwell bypass for construction within the period to 1996: the Winscombe bypass will continue to be safeguarded."

The existing plan is that in 1994 or 1995 the county will hope to start to spend £3 million, at 1985 prices, on the Banwell part of this road. I am afraid that that delay is too long. Ten years at least for this hell to continue is unacceptable to my constituents. When I learn that the Winscombe bypass is unlikely to be started until after 1996, at a cost of, say £3·8 million, making perhaps £7 million in all as the cost of the total bypass, I despair at the parsimony of the Government, who should be able to find that sum for such an important road extension.

My constituents—Mrs. Anthea James and a number of her friends—have formed an organisation which they call the Traffic Action Group, Banwell. I sent my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State a copy of the census which they carried out in a professional manner for 12 hours a day for five working days last July. The survey revealed the astonishing figure of nearly 10,000 vehicles of one sort of another a day—not including the night—passing through Banwell. If there is a six-minute delay—the arithmetic is easier using that number—it means that 1,000 man-hours a day are wasted sitting in traffic jams around Banwell. Add the cost of fuel and all the other frustrations emanating from traffic damage and we find that this one bottleneck costs an astonishing amount, running into millions of pounds a year.

The Department of Transport has methods to calculate the economic benefits of bypasses, but it does not need an economics graduate to work out that an investment of £7 million in this bypass would rapidly be returned to the local economy in better transport facilities and access. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will not tell me in too much detail that he does not have any great responsibility for this matter and that it is just the county council's responsibility. The time is coming when central Government will have to grasp some of these transport problems.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will know that the vast majority of the road building budget in the county of Avon is taken up on building the Avon ring road. This is adjudged by his Department to be a local feeder road, not a trunk road. I very much hope that he will have yet another look at the prospect of making the Avon county road a Department of Transport trunk road. If he will, that will unblock many schemes in the county, not just in Banwell. His Department has just had an extra £65 million from the Chancellor's largesse. I should have thought that a county as important as Avon—a centre point in our national road system — would certainly justify a little extra expenditure to help us all. I am not in any way suggesting that the Avon county ring road is not a priority; it certainly is. The traffic on the outskirts of Bristol is a disgrace.

I turn to the problems of Weston-super-Mare. My difficulty is that I would hate to give the impression that the town is always one big traffic jam, because it is not. I am pleased to see you in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because not long ago you had the good wisdom to marry a most attractive widow who lived in the village of Banwell. Although I would never invoke your assistance in this matter, I appreciate your presence, as you will be only too familiar with the two problems that I am enumerating.

On a Saturday morning in July and August the traffic in Weston-super-Mare is such that any sensible planner would have to consider doing something about it. Indeed, Avon county council, in conjunction with the district, has over the years reserved the line of a road that would run from junction 21 of the motorway, through the heart of the town and out to the industrial estate where the heavy traffic goes. That would have a sensational effect on the town's traffic problems. It is now being actively talked about by all those involved in local government in my part of the world.

During my time as Member of Parliament for Weston-super-Mare more than 10,000 houses have been built in the district known as Worle, and we are still building lots more, with even more planned at Locking castle. Weston-super-Mare does not enjoy a very healthy employment figure. It is about 2 per cent. above the national average, and is the worst in the county of Avon. My industrialist friends and constituents tell me that if the road was built, it would be a substantial inducement to industry to move to the centre of Weston-super-Mare and to employ people in an area where there is considerable pressure. In national terms, the costs are not very great, but they are completely beyond the district council's capacity. It is a county matter, but it has other priorities.

We are talking about £12 million, or perhaps a little less, at today's prices in order to solve the problem in one fell swoop. But there is also section 52 blackmail, by which planning permission is given for houses in return for substantial payments by developers. However, that has come up against a block. The amounts required from the developers are so great that they are not prepared to sell the land. I was horrified to hear of threats of compulsory purchase by Conservative authorities, and to me that is quite unacceptable. We must be careful not to overdo these things. But even if such sums were paid, they would be inadequate to build the town centre-M5 link.

I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister listens to such appeals from all over the country, but there is something that he could consider that might help all of us. When the transport supplementary grant is paid, I believe that no money goes to the county authority for design work in advance of construction or for land bought in advance of it. My county surveyor makes a most reasonable plea to me. He says, "If we plan ahead, deploy staff and buy land in advance, as prudent planners should do, we are discouraged because the Department does not give us a grant." That is folly of the highest order. In considering the ever-increasing problems of traffic, I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind whether that policy is wise and whether the change that I suggest would not be of considerable assistance.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for attending the debate. However, I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) whose mother lives in my constituency and knows it well, would like to intervene for a moment.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I am grateful for the opportunity to intervene briefly in the debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) has said, I have an interest as a regular visitor to his constituency, where my mother lives. She is a keen supporter of my hon. Friend. From my experience of making many visits to Weston-super-Mare, I agree very much with what my hon. Friend has said. The number of visitors pouring into Weston-super-Mare is enormous now that the quality of the communications network means that the M5 passes its door, and especially in the summer. The town's population has grown rapidly with the development at Worle and the prospect of another development at Locking castle. The village of Banwell, if it had been in any other part of the country, would have been pedestrianised years ago. It is an obvious candidate for a pedestrian scheme as heavy vehicles attempt to fight their way through narrow winding streets.

I support entirely all that my hon. Friend has said. The bypass programme is one of the important features of the Government's transport policy. It has brought relief to many towns and villages. I cannot believe that we should be talking about a gap of 10 years between now and when the people of Banwell and the Weston-super-Mare area generally can expect to be relieved of the heavy volume of traffic that now prevails. I appeal to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to give this matter the most careful thought and speedy action.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin). During his time in this place, from 1969 onwards, he has fought assiduously for his constituents. I congratulate him on his success over the hospital in his constituency. As he rightly said, his efforts in this instance should be directed as much to the county council as to me, and I suspect that unless his efforts on this occasion pay off even faster than those which he directed to the hospital, he will have to stay in the House for quite some time.

My hon. Friend has offered an ingenious possible solution, to which I shall turn shortly. Before doing so, I wish to recognise the contribution that has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs). I am delighted to learn that he has some links with the village of Banwell. I wish to recognise also the enduring interest in transport matters of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who is seen in the Chamber on more occasions than he is able to speak in it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare has been persistent. I am glad that not every hon. Member is as persistent as he is, but in fighting for something that otherwise would be delayed it is the proper role of an hon. Member to go on and on until success is achieved. It is true that our national programme of 160 bypasses would not have been possible if there had not been a Conservative Government. The money available for new national road construction between 1974 and 1979 was exactly halved in real terms. We could not provide for the economic prosperity of Weston-super-Mare or of Swindon, with its industrial changes, or of any of the regions of Britain, unless we had the funds to enable us to do so. When there are calls for infrastructure spending, there is a need to look to a Conservative Government, and especially this one, who have provided the resources, rather than turn to the rhetoric that we so often hear from the Labour party.

Although we have achieved much with the national programme of trunk roads and motorways, and have been able to give substantial help to local highway authorities and councils, in the main, through the transport supplementary grant, there is a need to keep a sense of proportion over what my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare gently referred to as the largesse of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have never thought that providing taxpayers' money was quite largesse, but there has been a welcome increase in the roads programme. If £65 million is divided between the 650 constituencies of the United Kingdom, the result is roughly £100,000 each, if my mathematics are still working at this time of night. That is not the straightforward answer, however.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare spoke of the Department or the Government trunking the Avon ring road. I am sure that that is an issue on which it would be right for me to think. I cannot offer him a guaranteed acceptance of his idea. It is clearly one of the reasons why the county is not able to put the Banwell bypass in the order of priorities that my hon. Friend and his constituents would want.

It is clear that my hon. Friend's constituents not only want, but need, an improvement in the local road network, especially the much-needed bypass at Banwell and I congratulate his action group on its traffic census work. I believe that much more can be done in both road safety and environmental improvement if people get interested in the details of possible beneficial road schemes. It is not just the county or the Department that should provide the expertise. To make inroads into the reduction of unnecessary accidents we need a large number of road casualty reduction experts, preferably about 56 million of them.

There is no argument about the desirability of a bypass at Banwell. As my hon. Friend said, the problem lies in the priority to be given to the various improvements recognised as being required. My hon. Friend will not need reminding that, with the exception of the M5 motorway, which is the Department's responsibility, all the roads in his constituency are the responsibility of Avon county council. I note his suggestion that we should trunk a further section of road, but at present, and perhaps for the foreseeable future, it is for the county council alone to determine the priority to be accorded to any improvements considered necessary for its roads.

The approved structure plan contains proposals for a new link between the M5 at junction 21 and the A371 and for a bypass at Banwell. As my hon. Friend said, it is a disappointment for his constituents to know that the motorway link road is shown for construction in the period beyond 1996, and the bypass, to put it gently, in the period up to 1996. The nub of the problem is that the county council has accorded top priority to the construction of the Avon ring road, a new road around the eastern side of Bristol, aimed at improving communications in the depressed southern and eastern parts of the city. This is a very expensive scheme which will cost around £40 million and take up the major proportion of the resources which the council is prepared to allocate to highway improvement for some years to come.

Despite this, the county council has made some progress towards implementing its highway strategy for Weston-super-Mare. Much of the link between the St. George's interchange at junction 21 and the town centre has either been completed or is programmed for construction in conjunction with various development proposals. My hon. Friend also made a number of points about section 52, which could perhaps be considered by officials at the Department or at the Department of the Environment. If there is more to be said, we may write to my hon. Friend.

As I have said, there is recognition of the need for a bypass at Banwell. Conditions in the village are well known both to the county council and to the Department. As my hon. Friend said, a route for the bypass is being protected from development, but the county council has expressed the view that many other schemes elsewhere in the county may merit higher priority than the bypass at Banwell following completion of the ring road.

The Government are often accused of interfering with local authorities and of wishing to interfere more. I think that this is one of the occasions when, in general, it might be right for Government not to interfere, although I can understand any hon. Member asking why we have not come in with bigger boots and perhaps some financial inducement for the county council to change its order of priorities. A factual description of the situation, however, is that it is up to people in the county to fight for the right ordering of priorities. I hope that this debate will have a valuable role to play in that.

When the county council has firm plans for Banwell, the Government may be able to help with transport supplementary grant. As my hon. Friend knows, we use this to assist local authorities to improve their more important roads. Hon. Members generally may wish to know that we have recently produced a guide in plain English explaining the transport supplementary grant system. There are copies in the Library and the guide has been sent to all local highway authorities in sufficient numbers for distribution to councillors. I hope that hon. Members of the Labour party and alliance parties, if they are interested, will read Hansard, because at this time of the evening they do not appear to be especially interested in the operation of the transport supplementary grant system.

The grant allows us to respond to bids by local authorities for improvements to their roads which are vital to the national as well as the local economy. The grant system concentrates on programmes helping to cope with heavier, longer distance traffic. The aim is not simply to improve the flow of goods and services or to boost the employment opportunities in the tourist areas, but to help to reduce accidents and save lives. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare is concerned about these three aims and that the right mixture is achieved. An important aim of the grant is to help local authorities to bring relief to communities suffering the effects of such traffic, for example, with the type of bypass which my hon. Friend is after.

We are already helping the county with the first stages of the Avon ring road. The bypass for Banwell could be another candidate for consideration when the time comes. I must emphasise that the judgment of how and when the bypass proceeds is a matter for Avon.

At the moment my hon. Friend is frustrated, if I may put it that plainly, that his efforts to secure some improvements in the local road network in his constituency have borne little fruit. My hon. Friend rightly says that that difficulty could be solved by the Government, although that is not especially likely at the moment. It could certainly be solved by a re-ordering of priorities, but I would not want to upset my hon. Friend's colleagues in the rest of the country by saying to which schemes the county should give a higher or lower priority.

Parliament has given the county council full responsibility for the local road network, and it would not be appropriate for central Government to interfere in its assessment of the relative priorities of the many schemes contained in its structure plan.

Without the work of my hon. Friend and our colleagues, many bypasses—whether future ones such as Banwell or completed ones — would not have had a chance to be built now or ever. It is only because of the restructuring that we have done in the various spheres of transport that we have managed to get greater efficiency, greater capital spending and provide a greater prospect for relief, slightly earlier, for the sort of communities which my hon. Friend so well represents in this House.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

9.35 am

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): This is the first time that the House has had the opportunity for a full debate on AIDS. I welcome the opportunity this provides to set out the facts about the disease, the serious threat it poses to public health, and how the Government propose to meet that threat. I do not believe that anyone should underestimate just how serious that threat is, in this country as in most of the rest of the world.

AIDS—acquired immune deficiency syndrome—is a new disease. There were no known cases before 1981. The first case of transmission by blood transfusion was reported in the United States in 1983 and a reliable test for routine screening of blood donations was developed in 1985.

What makes AIDS a serious threat is, first, the disease itself is believed to be invariably fatal. There is no cure, nor any immediate prospect of one. So it is a deadly threat, and already in this country there have been 565 cases of which 284 have died.

The second reason is that it is infectious and there is no vaccine by which to protect people. It is not infectious in the same way as diseases such as measles, which are spread in the air by social contact. The disease is actually caused by a virus called HIV—human immune deficiency virus — getting into the bloodstream. The main ways of becoming infected are as a result of sexual intercourse, then, for drug abusers, by blood from an infected person being injected into another's and through babies being infected by the mother before or during birth. In sexual intercourse, we now know that the virus can pass not just from infected man to man, but from an infected woman to a man and from an infected man to a woman.

There is a third factor which makes the disease particularly difficult to counter. It has to do with the characteristics of the virus. Although it does not live long outside the body, once inside it will survive a very long time—possibly for life. Furthermore, it can take several years between catching the infection and becoming ill with AIDS. The average is five years. During that time individuals will mostly be completely well and unaware that they are affected. They are, however, infectious to others. In the United Kingdom it is estimated that about 30,000 people are infected with the virus. They are carriers capable of transmitting the virus. It is not known how many carriers will eventually contract the disease themselves and die, but the proportion is relatively high. So far it is 25 to 30 per cent., but it may be more.

So those are the key factors. The AIDS disease is fatal and incurable. The virus is infectious in certain specific ways — principally through sexual intercourse and by drug abusers sharing needles — and has a long incubation period.

It must be emphasised that AIDS is a long-term problem. It is not a problem that will disappear in the next six months or so. The likelihood is that it is a problem for at least the next 10 years, probably for the rest of the century. The number of AIDS cases will inevitably increase whatever we do. Even if no one else becomes infected from tomorrow, there are still the estimated 30,000 carriers—many of whom will eventually develop the disease.

I believe that in that position — a challenge over several Parliaments — it is important to seek as much common ground between the parties as possible. My aim will be to seek as much agreement as possible in the methods to be used to tackle AIDS. I do not think that anyone should be under any illusion that there are some profoundly difficult issues to address.

The Government will seek to ensure that the fullest information is available to the public, and briefings by my staff will be offered not only to Opposition spokesmen but to all Members of the House who want to know more about the position and the background. I shall write to all Members next week with a full factual brief on the issue.

There is another important issue and lesson. We can do something about the threat; the position can be contained. We have the opportunity of learning from the experience of other countries where the disease has gained a greater hold. In the United States, for example, the latest figures show that almost 25,000 cases have been reported and an estimated 1·5 million people infected with the virus. In Europe there are countries where the position is substantially worse than in the United Kingdom. In parts of Africa it is worst of all.

There is no comfort in those figures, but we have the opportunity to prevent the position here from becoming as serious as it tragically is elsewhere. At the moment, only a relatively small group of people are infected in this country. In the main, they are homosexuals or drug addicts or their partners. In addition, there are the tragic cases of haemophiliacs who have been infected with contaminated blood, and, perhaps worst of all, of small babies who have been infected by their mothers.

But the virus is spreading. Unless we all act to protect ourselves, it will not be long before we find the numbers infected rising as high here as in other countries. In those circumstances, there is clearly an important role for Government. But the key to containing the spread of the infection ultimately rests with the individual's own behaviour.

Over the past four years, the Government have already taken a range of measures. Since 1982 AIDS cases have been reported on a voluntary basis to the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre. The same is true of HIV infection since it first became possible to identify it by a blood test. Since 1983, warnings have gone to all blood donors telling those in high risk groups not to give blood. The evidence is that those warnings have largely been successful. Since the end of 1984, heat treated Factor VIII — the clotting factor deficient in haemophiliacs — has been available to clinicians in this country and has been produced in this country since April 1985. Since 1985, as soon as the present reliable test was available, all blood donations have been tested to eliminate the risk of anyone getting AIDS from infected blood or blood products in this country.

The Government have issued guidance for health care, social services and other staff about dealing with AIDS. We have provided funding for courses to train counsellors and 1,500 people have undergone training in the past 18 months, and the numbers will increase. Most importantly, we have mounted a wide-ranging public education campaign which has involved a series of national press advertisements, a Health Education Council booklet of which about 1 million have been printed, and the telephone advisory service, which has reached 2,500 calls a week.

Before I set out the other measures that the Government now propose, there is a strategic question on the action that the Government should be taking. I am in no doubt that the first priority in combating the disease must be public education and that a concerted attempt must be made to inform the public, and particularly the public most at risk, of the dangers. I believe that clear, explicit language must be used and that we must spare no effort to ensure that the measure is getting through. I understand clearly that there are other concerns and other suggestions, and we will listen to all of those during the debate. But public education is the first priority.

If proof of that approach is needed, we should look at the report that has just been published in the United States by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences in Washington — a body of national and international repute. As I have said, the position in the United States is much worse than here. One estimate is that by the end of 1991 there will be a cumulative total of 179,000 deaths in the United States, with 54,000 of them occurring in 1991 alone. Against that background, the report looked at the different options that were open to Government. It came to this conclusion:

"Neither vaccines nor satisfactory drug therapies for HIV infection or AIDS are likely to be available in the near future, but action can be taken now to reduce the further spread of HIV infection and thus to alter the course of the epidemic.

For at least the next several years the most effective measure for significantly reducing the spread of HIV infection is education of the public, especially those individuals at higher risk. People must have information on ways to change their behaviour and encouragement to protect themselves and others."

A similar point was put in a letter to The Times from a group of doctors at St. Mary's hospital in London, who also argued strongly that "health education must be our main defence at the present time".

Meanwhile, in the briefing that it sent round before the debate the British Medical Association quotes the United States surgeon general as saying:

"Information is the only vaccine we have".

I agree with that assessment. For that reason, the Government will expand and intensify their public education campaign. We shall be making £20 million available over the next 12 months for that purpose. The main elements of the campaign that I shall shortly be launching are as follows: from this Sunday there will be a further intensive round of newspaper advertising lasting over the week—the fifth round of such advertisements; that will be backed up by a general poster campaign, with posters appearing in 1,500 sites around the country; shortly after that there will be a youth campaign, using magazines, radio and cinema; early in the new year there will be a leaflet drop to all 23 million households in this country accompanied by television and radio advertising to maximise its effect; the HEC leaflet "Don't Aid AIDS" will be sent to all pharmacies—around 11,000 outlets—where members of the public can get them free.

In addition, I have had talks over the past few days with the chairmen of the BBC and the Independent Broadcasting Authority about the role of broadcasting in the education campaign. Both chairmen recognised the gravity of the situation and agreed that the broadcasting organisations had a role to play. They also showed their readiness to co-operate in public service broadcasting. I am extremely grateful for their co-operation and advice. The IBA yesterday issued a statement welcoming our proposals for radio and television advertising on AIDS and also announcing its intention to follow up those advertisements by a series of public service announcements on both independent television and independent radio. I am sure that the House will join me in welcoming that initiative.

At the same time, the Government are having talks with the Newspaper Society and are approaching members of the Newspaper Publishers Association. I should like to congratulate the many newspapers that have carried specific factual articles on AIDS and how its spread can be prevented.

With regard to the approach to be adopted in the Government's advertising, the advertising will aim basically to get over these messages: "Stick to one partner, but if you do not, use a condom." For drug misusers: "Do not inject drugs; if you cannot stop, do not share equipment." Over the next weeks and months we shall be seeking to get those messages across. What we must all seek to achieve is a change in people's behaviour — everyone taking responsibility for his own actions.

We are fortunate in having the market research results of our previous advertising campaigns to guide us. Clearly, however, the advertising will have to go into detail and will have to use language that is easy to understand. It may be that some will be offended by it. I regret that—but I have to say that I believe the greater danger is that the message does not get over.

There is also a difficult balance to be struck. At the moment, the infection is still virtually confined to the few relatively small groups. Unless we all take action, it will spread more widely into the heterosexual population, as it is already doing in other countries. So our message cannot be confined to those groups. That means striking a balance between warning everyone of the risks, while not causing unnecessary panic. There is next the important problem of long-term policy.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): As the Minister knows, there is an important Scottish dimension to this disease in that more than 50 per cent. of the injecting drug misusers in eastern Scotland are now carriers of acquired immunity deficiency synrome. For that reason we attach great urgency to a response to the McClelland report. Do the Government intend to respond to that report today? If they do not, will the Minister give an assurance that we will have a response within the next week or so?

Mr. Fowler: The Government understand the importance of the issue. The hon. Gentleman's question raises complex issues and I shall not be able to respond to it today. I entirely share his view that we need to respond relatively quickly. Of course the issue is not just the problem of AIDS but whether the free supply of needles may encourage drug misusers to inject. As the hon. Gentleman said, the McClelland report proposes the issue of clean needles and syringes to misusers basically in return for their dirty ones.

I must underline that any such scheme would need careful supervision and would need to go hand in hand with expert assessment, counselling and treatment. The Government are considering the matter seriously and urgently and I hope that we will be able to make our intentions clear as soon as possible.

There is also the long-term problem of public education. The Government must carry out a publicity effort over the next few months because there is no alternative to that. However, in the longer term we need a new body to develop and carry forward the education campaign for the good reason that the threat and the challenge posed by AIDS will continue. The campaign is intended to inform the public about risks such as this and will be a major part of health education.

The importance of this task and the resources that the Government need to devote to it make it right to enhance and strengthen the role of the Health Education Council. To that end I propose to reconstitute it so that it becomes a special health authority with a clear line of accountability to Ministers and to Parliament. The new authority will initially assume the current responsibilities of the Health Education Council. I also intend that from an early date it should be given the major executive responsibility for public education about AIDS and that it should be resourced accordingly. Therefore, it will have responsibility for a much larger budget than the Health Education Council.

As a special health authority, the new authority will be an integral part of the National Health Service in England. As a result, it should be more responsive than an outside body can be to the needs of the service and in turn will have more influence in setting priorities for the service and ensuring that the needs of health education and promotion are properly recognised. We envisage that the new body will also have a United Kingdom dimension to its work, particularly, for example, in relation to AIDS where there is clearly a need for a nationwide centrally conducted campaign. The exact relationship of the new agency with health education arrangements in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland will need to be settled and may vary from country to country. The current statutory arrangements governing health education in Scotland will not be affected, but effective working collaboration will be established.

My aim is that the Health Education Council should be reconstituted on its new statutory basis with effect from 1 April 1987. I should like to place on record my appreciation and that of my colleagues of the work and achievements of the staff and members of the council. It is, I know, held in high regard in the Health Service and beyond.

The new authority will provide enhanced opportunities for its staff to carry forward and develop the important and wide-ranging programmes which the council already has in hand as well as its vital new task in relation to AIDS. There will, of course, be full consultation with staff and trades union representatives to ensure that proper regard is paid to the interests of council staff in the handing-over arrangements. We want to ensure that there is no loss of momentum in the work of the council, and the transitional arrangements will have to take account of that requirement.

I intend to make a statement shortly about membership, staffing and budget of the new authority. The terms of office of existing members of the Health Education Council end in December, but I shall invite them to serve for a further period until the arrangements for the handover to the new body are complete and the formal dissolution of the council as a company limited by guarantee takes effect. Essentialy, these new arrangements underline the crucial importance that health education must have.

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): We have listened with interest to what the Minister has said about the advertising campaign. However, I am quite sure that we are all waiting to hear about extra funding to enable local health authorities and hard-pressed hospitals, counsellors and pyschotherapists to cope with the problem. That is what we want to know because we cannot cope with the problem simply through an advertising campaign.

Mr. Fowler: I am coming to the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman. Given his knowledge and experience in these areas, he will appreciate that public health education must be the number one priority. I have just announced a major increase in funding for that.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The Minister spoke about the abolition of the Health Education Council and its replacement by a special health authority. Will he give the House a guarantee that the changes will not undermine the right of the council to be critical of policies carried out by his Department or by other Departments in relation to actions on health taken by the council?

Mr. Fowler: Yes. That is an important point and I expect the new body to have the same sort of sturdy independence as the existing body while at the same time making a contribution to the Health Service. I have discussed this with the chairman of the Health Education Council, Sir Brian Bailey. The whole point is that we are seeking to increase the effectiveness of health education and not to detract from it. In no way do I run away from the fact that the Health Education Council and the proposed new health education authority may have different views and may want to campaign in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Will this new authority require the introduction of legislation?

Mr. Fowler: No—or at any rate primary legislation will not be required, although I think that some regulations will be required.

As the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) said, there are other areas in which the Government need to take action. It is clear that the first parts of the Health Service to be affected by greater public awareness and anxiety about AIDS are the clinics for sexually transmitted diseases. Those large cities, especially in London, are seeking increasing numbers of people who are worried that they may have contracted the AIDS virus. The clinics are offering these people counselling and tests to see whether they are carrying the virus.

[Mr. Fowler]

I fully recognise that these clinics are in the front line and under great pressure, especially to provide the extensive counselling necessary for people who are found to be infected with the virus. I am therefore asking all health authorities to ensure that their clinics for sexually transmitted diseases are given adequate resources to meet the demands that are made upon them. All districts will submit their plans for dealing with AIDS by the end of next month, and I expect them to reflect this priority need.

Another priority is the treatment and help that must be made available to people who have already contracted the disease. The bulk of the cases so far have occurred in the London area and a number of London hospitals have acquired great expertise in treating AIDS patients. Indeed, they are in the forefront of medical treatment in the world. Extra funds have been provided to the Thames regions for this purpose this year and more money will be provided next year. I am currently considering the allocation of resources to health authorities following the statement two weeks ago by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I can assure the hon. Member for Torfaen that resources for handling AIDS will be taken into account in that allocation.

As more AIDS cases develop, more districts and hospitals throughout the country will need to become involved. It is crucial that district health authorities prepare themselves for this. I emphasised this at the meeting in Sheffield on Wednesday last of regional health authority chairmen and I am in no doubt about the importance they attach to the issue. I am also writing to every district health authority chairman in the country asking them to plan for appropriate action in their areas. Obviously the kind of action will differ according to the area.

Counselling is and must be an important part of the plans. Because AIDS is incurable and fatal, the knowledge that someone has got the virus can obviously have an appalling impact on them and their families. People who are tested for the presence of the virus should be carefully and sensitively counselled about the implications if their test proves positive. We have devoted priority to setting up effective counselling systems. Three centres for training professionals in AIDS counselling have already been established and are funded directly by my Department. Already over 1,500 counsellors have been trained. Each of these can pass on the benefits of his training to his colleagues. Our training arrangements are being expanded further and we are supporting training courses for nurses as well.

There is the additional question of research. It is imperative that no effort is spared in seeking a cure for AIDS and a vaccine against the virus. Public sector research in this country is co-ordinated by the Medical Research Council under my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): There is an educational dimension to this problem which involves the schools. Can the Secretary of State say whether there are any plans to ensure that young people in the upper forms receive the education that everybody else is to receive?

Mr. Fowler: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has that aim very much in mind and will be seeking to ensure exactly what the hon. Gentleman suggests.

I understand that no worthwhile research project has gone unfunded. However, the Government will talk with the Medical Research Council about this issue.

Over and above this, there is the contribution of the British pharmaceutical industry, which has built up an outstanding international reputation for the quality of its research. Currently the industry is spending more than £500 million a year on research and development in this country, and some of this work is relevant to the AIDS problem.

For example, Burroughs Wellcome was responsible for developing the test for antibodies to the HIV infection which is now in use as the method for screening blood in this country. The same company, which has an excellent track record in vaccines and anti-viral drugs, has developed and produced AZT—currently the subject of clinical trials in this country. We know that a number of other major pharmaceutical companies in this country are devoting increasing resources to research into this problem.

But it is essential that the research effort to fight AIDS is not looked at simply on a national basis. This is an international effort to which massive resources are being devoted worldwide, a point to which I shall return in a moment. Before doing so, I should like to make this point. I have spoken about the measures we have taken, or are taking, to contain the spread of the HIV virus. There are other important issues still to be addressed, particularly those related to screening for the virus. A number of proposals have been put forward for compulsory or voluntary screening. They range from screening particular groups to general screening.

Some of the more limited measures could be incorporated into existing arrangements for individual medical tests. I make no apology for the fact that no decisions have yet been taken on this or on the wider issue, for a decision to take any such measure—even the more limited measures—could not be taken lightly.

Obviously I understand why some people advocate wider screening measures, but it is important to recognise the questions that would have to be addressed before deciding to go down this road. There are real practical difficulties in embarking on any general, large-scale screening—whether of residents or of visitors to the United Kingdom. It is doubtful whether it is even practical, and the medical profession generally has made it clear that in its view a test should be administered only on a voluntary basis and only if the implications are understood by the person being tested. There is a fear that any element of compulsion may drive people away from seeking advice or help. We have to recognise that the results of screening tests can become out of date very quickly indeed.

But the most fundamental question is this: what is the purpose of screening and what happens after it? From the point of view of the patient, there is no vaccine or cure. AIDS is quite unlike the notifiable diseases which can be treated. From the point of view of the general public, we are not talking about an infectious disease to which the traditional response of quarantine for a short period is relevant. The virus stays with the person for life. Other people are not at risk through normal day-to-day contact with them in ordinary working or social circumstances.

The House would wish to be aware of these problems, which arise on any proposal to introduce screening, and to reflect on them. The House will also wish to bear in mind the personal impact on an individual of being told that the result of a test is positive — which can be devastating. The United States Institute of Medicine has come down in general against screening, and in the recent referendum in California people voted against compulsory screening by more than two to one. To return to the international dimension, AIDS is a problem for all of us.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Before the Secretary of State returns to the international dimension, may I say that he has mentioned a very wide range of problems. We are aware that a special Cabinet committee has been established under the chairmanship of Lord Whitelaw to co-ordinate the work of Government Departments. Is the Secretary of State able to say whether that committee will be prepared to meet rapidly some of the voluntary organisations, including the Terrence Higgins Trust, which have a great deal of experience and wisdom to offer?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is right when he says that a Cabinet committee has been set up, for the very good reason that the issues do not relate simply to my Department. They relate also to the Departments of my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Education and Science and to many other Government Departments. It is right that Government Departments should be in contact with the voluntary organisations, and my Department is, I hope, in very close contact with the Terrence Higgins Trust. If the trust or any other voluntary organisation feels that further meetings are required, I hope that they will let the Department know and I shall ensure that those meetings take place.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Before my right hon. Friend leaves the question of screening, I suggest to him that there may be a very strong clamour for the screening of visitors to this country, particularly for the screening of visitors from those areas of the world where AIDS is prevalent such as east Africa. I should warn him, while my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is also on the Treasury Bench, that if such measures were taken against visitors to this country, it might be counterproductive in terms of the medical research that we are seeking to do in east Africa, in co-operation with the medical authorities and the research workers there.

Mr. Fowler: We shall obviously remember my hon. Friend's words. He mentioned east Africa, but the problem is not remotely confined just to Africa. It applies to countries like the United States. For that reason, I have sought to set out some of the practical difficulties that will be involved, quite apart from any of the other difficulties that are involved in implementing such a policy.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: I think that it would be for the convenience of the House if I did not give way on this occasion.

AIDS is basically a problem for all of us, not only in this country but in many other countries. This international dimension is important in a number of ways. First, we are able to learn from the experience of other countries—both from the way in which the disease has spread and from the measures taken to combat it. Second, we are able to share the effort of responding to it—for example, by seeking a vaccine or cure.

Third, some of the screening measures proposed—those for overseas visitors to which reference has just been made—would clearly involve other countries. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that nations should be in very close contact on these issues and should be aware of policy developments. For this reason, I propose to make an early visit to the World Health Organisation and to the United States to discuss these matters, and I shall also be talking with some of my main European counterparts.

I have sought to be frank with the House about the dangers that we face, and we shall want to listen very carefully to the views expressed in the debate in developing policy. AIDS poses a uniquely difficult public health challenge. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that the spread of AIDS can be prevented and the problem contained. The Government will do all in their power to emphasise to the public the seriousness of the position and the action necessary to combat AIDS. Over the next years, however, the action needed can be taken only by individuals.

10.10 am

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): We very much welcome this important and long overdue debate and the constructive speech by the Secretary of State, who made a much wider statement of Government proposals than we have had so far. We shall wish, however, to ask a number of detailed questions, especially about resources. I believe that the Secretary of State said that resources to combat AIDS would be "taken into account", but we need to know exactly how much new extra money will be provided and for precisely what purposes. I hope that when the Minister for Health winds up the debate he will be able to give more detailed information along those lines.

I hope that the debate will serve two main purposes. First, I hope that it will play a part in alerting the nation to a potentially national crisis of epidemic proportions and in securing broad agreement on the role of the Government in initiating and carrying out a range of essential and increasingly urgent measures. Secondly, I hope that the debate will bring balance and perspective to the problem. In the past few months, as a nation we have gone from hardly talking about AIDS at all to scarcely talking about anything else. Without firm leadership there is a real risk of moving from complacency to hysteria as the fears and anxieties so often fed on ignorance gain momentum. It is against that background that the Government's proposals must be judged.

At the outset it is necessary to root out certain misconceptions that have gained ground in some quarters. AIDS has been described as a "virulent gay plague" when it is nothing of the kind. It is not a plague like smallpox or cholera, it is not confined to gay men, and it is not particularly virulent. A plague is a disease that is easily and indiscriminately transmitted through normal casual social contact. That is not true of AIDS. Although the virus has so far been largely concentrated among the homosexual community, it is becoming clear that promiscuity, rather than homosexuality, is the real source of risk. AIDS is not especially virulent and is able to spread rapidly only because carriers are ignorant of their condition or neglect suitable containment measures.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

Another serious misconception is that the virus has already spread so far that, with no cure or vaccine in prospect for at least five years, little can be done. I believe that such despair is seriously misplaced. I think the Secretary of State said that 565 new cases had been reported this year and that the figure was likely to rise rapidly to some 3,000 within the next two years. The vast majority of those cases, however, are still confined to the high risk groups. Heterosexual transmission is believed to apply in only some 3 per cent. of cases. Out of 2,500,000 blood donations, in which known high risk groups are asked not to participate, the rate of HIV infection detected has been of the order of 0·002 per cent. and only three donors who were found to be HIV positive denied being in the recognised risk groups. That strongly suggests that the general heterosexual population is at present largely free from infection and that there is nothing inevitable about the general population succumbing to AIDS. That is a very important fact.

We are now at a crucial turning point. The United Kingdom figures for heterosexually transmitted AIDS are similar to those for homosexual men three or four years ago when there were just 36 new cases. The incidence of AIDS outside London is now comparable with its incidence in the Greater London area three or four years ago. Again, the implications are clear. Whether AIDS now spreads extensively throughout the general population depends on people's readiness to modify their behaviour where necessary and on the willingness and ability of the Government to mobilise supportive measures to help bring about that modification of behaviour.

The vital need for a full range of preventive measures backed by an immediate increase in resources is shown by the knowledge of what would happen if the current rate of increase in AIDS cases—I believe that the figure is now doubling every 10 months — were to continue unchecked for the next five years. A parliamentary answer at column 858 of Hansard on 21 October stated that by October 1991 there might be 35,000 cases and 18,000 deaths. A further five-year projection is more speculative, because it depends on people's readiness to modify their behaviour, but if figures are calculated on the same basis, by December 1995 there could be a total of more than 1 million reported cases, with well over 500,000 deaths. As the average cost of treating an AIDS patient is between £10,000 and £20,000, any niggardliness in preventive action now would clearly constitute the most extreme false economy.

Although the tone of this debate, which has been well set by the Secretary of State, should be constructive and non-partisan, it cannot be denied, and should not be concealed, that the Government's response has been too little too late. By 1985, four years after the first cases began to appear in Britain, the Government were spending a total of only £2·5 million on treatment and counselling, development of screening and laboratory services, public health education and the voluntary sector. Frankly, that is peanuts compared with many advertising campaigns for commercial products. in the same year, Proctor and Gamble, for example, spent £47 million on advertising.

I do not think anybody will disagree that getting across the right message in regard to AIDS is far more intricate and infinitely more important to the national well-being than any commercial campaign. Every £1 million spent on prevention will probably save £10 million which would otherwise have to be spent caring for AIDS victims. The Secretary of State mentioned a budget of £20 million. That is a considerable advance, but I doubt whether it is enough. Spending £30 million on national publicity in a public health education campaign does not seem unreasonable or excessive.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): If the Labour party had encouraged some Labour-controlled local authorities to spend more money on this type of campaign rather than encouraging groups which are known to be promiscuous, perhaps we would have got somewhere much earlier.

Mr. Meacher: That is not a very helpful intervention. By suggesting that any health authority, regardless of its political persuasion, should deliberately encourage promiscuity is unworthy of the hon. Lady. She should withdraw any such suggestion.

I hope the Government agree—there are some signs that they do—that television commercials must be quite frank, explicit, direct and hard-hitting. Over-moralistic caution can be counter-productive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) mentioned the good medical briefing put out by the Terrence Higgins Trust. Other good examples of the types of material that might be produced are the recently produced leaflet and programmes put out by Scottish Television, which seem to have done more during the past one and a half weeks than, I sometimes think, the Government have done in the past one and a half years. It is very good material and worth taking seriously.

Preventive action by the DHSS must be matched in every region and district in the National Health Service. The Secretary of State touched on that. If a district has not yet experienced any AIDS cases, that is no reason for neglecting prevention—quite the reverse. The first step should surely be the appointment of a team to draw up a regional programme on prevention, including regional telephone information services where appropriate. Each district should also appoint an AIDS prevention officer, whose duties would include liaison with voluntary groups. A broad average of £50,000 a year would be a reasonable sum to enable each district to provide an AIDS prevention officer and support services.

Extra assistance is needed for general practitioners. They are in the front line probably more than any other group. They are most likely to be approached first by people who are anxious about themselves or their relatives. District health authorities should take the lead to organise an education programme for all GPs in their area.

I do not doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) will say more about London. More than three quarters of the AIDS cases that have so far come to light have been in the Greater London area and the burden on certain London hospitals and London's services has been correspondingly severe.

London has been doubly hit. It has been hit by the disease and it has fared badly financially because the Resource Allocation Working Group system has been put to uses which were never intended. I hope the Secretary of State agrees that, under the impact of AIDS, London needs support over and above that given to the rest of the country. It must be new money, not money which is artificially manufactured by so-called efficiency savings, which are really cuts in other parts of the Health Service.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): We must consider the awful potential of the disease, but we are poised as never before in view of the technological and scientific advances that have been achieved. Does my hon. Friend agree that a great deal of money should be injected into research organisations, as more is known about this virus than has been known about any other disease at this stage in its development? We should consider how long it took to find out about tuberculosis and smallpox. An enormous amount of information has been gained on this disease. There should be a concerted effort to find out more, and a great deal of money should be given to help organisations which are trying to find a cure or a vaccine.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend has almost entirely anticipated what I was about to say, and he has said it so well that I wonder whether I should leave out that part of my speech.

I agree that voluntary bodies have a vital role to play. The truly remarkable achievement of the Terrence Higgins Trust in a short time is well recognised. Many other organisations have played an important part and could play a bigger one. I refer to the Albany Society, Body Positive, the London Gay Switchboard, the Haemophilia Society and SCODA, all of which should be enabled to expand their important functions.

The London Lighthouse Project needs support when it is being used to set up a hospice. It serves a double purpose, as it also saves money. There is a striking difference in the cost per patient in San Francisco and New York, because in the former much care is provided in hospices or special housing, whereas in the latter hospitals are used. I hope that that lesson will be learnt in Britain.

As my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) said, a great deal is already known about AIDS, although we are short of a vaccine or cure. It is reasonable to assume that a reasonable budget for the whole range of preventive measures against the spread of AIDS would, as I proposed in my letter to the Prime Minister of 10 November, be within the range of £50 million to £100 million. I wonder whether even that is adequate. That should be compared with a budget of £1·9 million which was allocated to combat AIDS last year by the DHSS. It was topped up in December with another £6·3 million. That represents a paltry 0·04 per cent. of the NHS's budget. That is frankly a ridiculous sum for protection against a problem which many people in the West regard as the biggest threat to public health this century.

The dribs and drabs approach that we have so far had has meant that the relevant services have had to live from hand to mouth since AIDS was first recognised in Britain. That has systematically prevented the development of serious national planning of services.

Mr. Chris Smith: Is my hon. Friend aware that several leading medical practitioners who are working on AIDS in London proposed to the Chief Medical Officer only some two or three months ago that, for between £5 million and £10 million, they could launch a major research project into AIDS and the spread of the virus? I understand, however, that they have been told that no decision can be made until next year. Would my hon. Friend like to comment on that?

Mr. Meacher: That comment is well directed at the Government. If it is true, it is a sad reflection of their priorities. Perhaps the Minister who is to reply to the debate will comment on that matter, because if the Government are serious that sort of work must surely command priority.

I make no apology for reiterating the importance of funding, because it is crucial in the fight against AIDS. In the end, it is the measure of the Government's seriousness in facing the problem. Nobody is suggesting that AIDS or any other problem can be solved by throwing money at it. We say, however, that it cannot be denied that AIDS, which is on the brink of exploding in this country like a time bomb of lethal proportions, cannot be resolved without a major increase in expenditure, not only for medical research into a vaccine or cure, but for much more widespread provision of health education, screening and advice and counselling services.

When faced with a death rate from AIDS which could — I hope to God that this does not happen — rise seventyfold in the next five years, and when the clinical care costs for nursing AIDS victims could rise to £300 million a year, any under-provision of prevention, counselling and research facilities could only constitute the grossest form of false economy.

Against that background, I have to say to the Secretary of State that it passes comprehension that, according to press reports—perhaps he will deny them if they are not true — of internal confidential papers, the Government are cutting by £4 million the funds for the Public Health Laboratory Service, which is the national agency monitoring the AIDS epidemic, with the result that six laboratories may have to close next year to meet the Government's cash limit. I do not know whether those reports are true — perhaps one of the Ministers will comment on them — but if they are, I hope that the Government will reconsider their decision.

Resource credibility is also the central issue in the drugs epidemic that is ravaging Edinburgh and Glasgow. So far there have been a relatively small number of cases of full-blown AIDS among drug misusers in those cities, but doctors are predicting a veritable explosion of full clinical AIDS cases next year, when the three-year latency period for many heroin addicts in Edinburgh will be up. From then on, if little or nothing is done, hundreds of young people can be expected to develop AIDS and die. The current Edinburgh figure of 1,500 to 2,000 virus carriers suggests that 700 or so will die over the next four years.

Most disturbing of all is the fact that researchers for Scottish Television, who have recently made comparisons with the New York experience, have found that, while the British figures are still far short of those in America, the explosive spread of the HIV virus is moving even faster here than in New York. In New York the number of AIDS victims is doubling every month.

It was against that background that the McClelland report to the Scottish Home and Health Department in September recommended the handing out of clean, disposable needles to addicts on a new-for-old basis at doctors' surgeries and hospitals, with the aim of reducing the spread of shared dirty needles, which are recognised as a major source of the transmission of AIDS. We listened to what the Secretary of State said on that matter and, while appreciating that careful consideration must be given to the suggestion, I had hoped for a more positive response. It is an important recommendation and McClelland is the chair of the Scottish AIDS advisory committee.

I believe that the committee's recommendation was right. Some people have objected on the ground that it might lead to more drug use, but anything that can significantly reduce or slow down the transmission of a lethal virus must surely be supported. It is worth noting that that method of containment has been tried in Amsterdam, where a pilot project is under way, and it seems to be having some success. Of course, I readily agree with the advisory committee's proposal that the Government should also support the handing out of the heroin substitute Methadone as a means of weaning addicts off needles.

I wish to comment briefly on some other issues on which I believe that a clear view from Parliament would be helpful. The first issue is screening. Some take the view that, as there is no treatment available to offer patients who have been infected with the virus and who are free of symptoms, and that the advice, at least to a homosexual man, which is to avoid unsafe practices and to reduce the number of partners, is the same whether he has a positive or a negative test, there is no point in offering these tests on a routine basis in clinics for sexually transmitted diseases.

On the other hand, some doctors consider that the test for HIV antibodies should be promoted by a campaign directed at all who have been at risk. The aim would be to ensure that as many as possible of those who have been infected come forward and thus be available for counselling about their subsequent sexual behaviour, which, as the Secretary of State correctly said, is the whole point of the exercise.

I believe that it makes sense to offer the test at clinics for sexually transmitted diseases, or perhaps even at specialised AIDS centres that may be needed, certainly to homosexual men, where there is any question of bisexuality, to drug addicts and to women who are in high-risk groups.

The counselling consequences are crucial. Experience has shown that quite drastic changes in behaviour can take place swiftly in times of crisis. It would be wrong to assume that most people are incapable of making rapid changes in their lifestyles when they are convinced of the necessity of doing so and have alternative options available. That is already taking place among gay men in their response to the "safer sex" campaign initiated by the Terrence Higgins Trust to reduce the risks of AIDS infection.

However, changes in behaviour will come about only if increased screening facilities are made available. At present, tests to establish the presence of HTLV-3 are offered only to those who show symptoms of infection, and they are probably only a small proportion of those carrying the virus. There simply are not sufficient laboratory facilities to make the test available to all those in the high-risk groups, and clinics do not have enough staff to offer even those already tested the care, advice and support that are needed. The urgent remedying of that defect must be a priority for Government action.

On the other hand, I believe that mass screening would provide only an illusory protection for the general public and would involve a huge waste of public money. It would be impossible to enforce it effectively without dramatically interfering with the civil liberties and personal privacy of the entire population. Indeed, the BMA has recently issued a statement to the effect that compulsory testing would be unethical as well as unworkable.

For all those reasons, it would be helpful — and I believe that the Secretary of State may be sympathetic to my suggestion — if the Government would make it clear in this debate that the alarmist proposals made in recent months, such as mass compulsory screening, screening at ports of entry or airports, the isolation of carriers and the compulsory carrying of cards by carriers, will not be implemented.

We should also consider the issue of confidentiality. AIDS is not highly infectious and making it a notifiable disease, which the Government have rightly resisted, would be counter-productive.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): The hon. Gentleman said that AIDS is not a highly infectious disease. How does he explain the fact that in Senegal 90 per cent. of children under 16 and 50 per cent. of the children under eight have the disease?

Mr. Meacher: I am not absolutely sure that we know the answers to those questions. It is certainly true that AIDS is found in breast milk, and in Africa the disease is transmitted from men to women and from women to men in a way that does not entirely replicate the experience in Europe. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to deny the obvious fact that overwhelmingly in this country the disease is transmitted through sexual contact and drug misuse. If proper measures to reduce sexual contacts, to stick to one partner, to use condoms and not to share dirty needles were carried out, there is no reason why the patterns of transmission described by the hon. Gentlemman should be seen in this country.

Experience with other sexually transmitted diseases shows that if AIDS was to be made a notifiable disease it would deter people — I do not believe that the Government intend this — from seeking treatment or advice from their doctors. That would simply make HTLV-3 even more difficult to trace and contain. There are already widespread misgivings among homosexuals about seeking treatment or advice because breaches of medical confidentiality have occurred, with distressing and damaging consequences. Confidential details of several people with AIDS have been made public. Every effort must be made to stop that in order not to undermine the trust between doctor and patient.

Finally, there is the important issue of discrimination and employment rights. Those people who have HIV antibodies positively diagnosed can experience loss of family ties, of employment, of accommodation, of mortgage and insurance facilities and of easy access to medical and dental services. The occupational problems that they face can be instantaneous and crippling.

There are already reports of HIV carriers whose employment has been summarily terminated for that reason alone. However, as the British Medical Association said earlier this year:

"The low infectivity of the virus means there is no reason why patients with this virus should be prevented from returning to the community or their work".

There is a real danger of creating a group of people who are very isolated. That would not only be wrong in principle — because they are entitled to health care as much as the rest of us — but would simply drive the condition underground. For those reasons, I believe that the Government should take early action to protect the employment status of HIV positives who are fit and capable of working. The war against AIDS must not become the war against those who have AIDS.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I would readily give way, but I have been speaking for some time and I am trying to finish. I should like to make my peroration and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will catch Mr. Speaker's eye later.

The struggle against AIDS is no longer merely a matter of morality or immorality, of public attitudes or political choices. It is a matter of life or death, potentially affecting millions of our people and especially our young people. Neither political sensitivity or expediency nor moral objections must be allowed to stand in the way of any step deemed likely to be effective in saving lives and preventing any additional individuals from contracting AIDS. That is the test by which the nation will judge both the Government and Parliament. We must not fail.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I hope that the House and the nation will rally to the plea of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services for an all-party approach to this terrible disease. That is why we, the members of the Select Committee on Social Services, decided earlier this month that our next inquiry would be into AIDS. I can tell the House that we have had that subject on the back burner for a long time, but we felt that, in response to the growing concern of our colleagues, it would be proper to hold an inquiry. We shall carry on many of the questions that have been raised in today's debate.

One of the biggest problems that we face in trying to achieve an agreed national policy on dealing with AIDS is the present uncertain nature of our knowledge of this terrible disease. The full title of the disease — the acquired immune deficiency syndrome — as its name suggests, reveals that the disease is different in character from most other viral diseases, if not all. At the same time, we must acknowledge, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) acknowledged, that much has been learnt about the character and the epidemiology of AIDS since it was first identified in 1981. Let us pay tribute to those who made the discoveries. However, there are so many questions left unanswered that it is difficult for any of us to be over-certain—beyond certain agreed points —as to what direction the Government should take in this matter.

In my short speech I should like to pose some questions. My first question starts with the virus. The name of the virus has changed. We have known it for some time as HTLV-3, yet we now refer to it as HIV, although I understand that it is the same virus. Is it a stable virus? Or, as some people have suggested, does it have the capacity to mutate relatively easily and frequently and thereby change its structure so rapidly that the immune system cannot alter its antibodies fast enough to keep up? If that is so, our enemy is not a static target, but a moving one. That suggests to me that it will take a longer, rather than a shorter period before the virologists can get the total definition of the virus and then develop a vaccine.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that the very nature of the virus—its ability to form mutants — is being used in genetic engineering? The hon. Gentleman's point about the mutations may not pose as big a barrier as we may have thought some years ago. Scientists can use the virus's capability against it.

Sir David Price: That is encouraging, but I am advised that that reduces the immediate prospects of a vaccine, which we all agree is the normal response to the disease.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to my next question in his speech. How long is the virus's incubation period? Two years ago we heard that the period was as low as nine months to a year, and I have heard figures now of up to seven years. My right hon. Friend said today that the average is about five years. That is very important. If we compare the incubation period of the AIDS virus with that of syphilis, which has an average incubation period of one month, we have a problem of an entirely different order. The longer incubation period has a direct bearing on the problems of screening to which the hon. Member for Oldham West referred.

My next question is even more relevant. How many of those who are found through a blood test to have the virus will go on to develop AIDS? Again, every time we consult the experts the figure rises. Two years ago it was as low as 10 per cent., and we have heard figures of as high as 75 per cent. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said today that his current advice is that the figure is 25 to 30 per cent. It is very important that we should know how many people will develop the disease. Even if we do not know that with absolute certainty—it is probably not possible to know definitely—we should at least know with reasonable certainty. That is essential information if we are to ask people voluntarily to submit to screening.

How is AIDS transmitted? It is now conventional wisdom that it is transmitted primarily through sexual intercourse and through some sexual practices more than others. It is transmitted through contaminated blood. However, we must ask whether it occurs at the lower levels of blood transmission between one person and another. Do small drops of blood transmit the disease or is it transmitted only on the larger scale of blood transfusions? My right hon. Friend mentioned the sharing of needles by drug abusers.

There is also the congenital aspect. My right hon. Friend mentioned infected mothers and fathers. One must ask, at what point does the disease so get into the race that it becomes endemic in the normal monogamous population? The information from America suggests that that has already happened there. I do not believe, therefore, that AIDS is quite as restricted in its victims as we have assumed until now.

Then there is the question whether the disease can be transmitted, as more traditional contagious diseases are transmitted, through saliva and tears—the hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned breast milk—and whether, hence, it may enter social activities such as kissing, hugging, crying and even shaking hands. Until now the answer has been a firm no, but I should like to know whether it is really a firm no.

The entire House would agree that the development of an effective vaccine is the normal response to a viral epidemic. Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that we are doing enough to develop an effective vaccine? What is happening in public laboratories, especially places such as Porton, in the pharmaceutical industry, in the universities and in private clinics?

We must also consider the world position. What attempts have been made to co-ordinate international research, or are we so far away from an agreed approach that it is better to allow each laboratory to do its own thing and to hope that, somewhere, a bright research scientist will come up with the answer? Sometimes that is a better way of doing it. Similar questions arise when we examine the need to develop more effective therapies for those who suffer from the full clinical symptoms of AIDS. At this stage in the history of AIDS it may be too optimistic to hope for a complete cure, but it may be possible to develop therapies that relieve suffering and delay the processes of the disease.

My right hon. Friend mentioned the work of the Wellcome Foundation in developing AZT, but is it effective only against secondary pneumonia, as one reads in the literature, and does it suffer from excessive toxicity, which some articles have suggested as an obstacle to its wider use? Can my right hon. Friend tell us about the Australian development of Isoprinosine? Can he confirm the encouraging rumours that one has heard about the work done with HIVA at Porton? What is the state of play? It is worth making a considerable effort in developing therapies that can delay the onset of the disease before we can obtain a cure.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned screening. How effective are the present methods of screening? All of us would do well to take on board the advice given by the British Medical Association in the brief that it sent to all hon. Members. It said:

"After a person becomes infected with the AIDS virus, it may take up to six months or more before they produce antibodies to the virus ie before 'seroconversion' occurs. So-called tests for Aids detect only the antibodies, not the virus itself. Thus a person may carry the virus for several months before it becomes detectable. This means that it would not be possible to identify every person carrying the AIDS infection, even if the whole population was screened."

That is very important.

To return to the questions that I asked about the nature of the virus, the BMA said later in its brief:

"Recently there have been reports that the AIDS virus is undergoing changes and that antibodies to the newer forms of the virus cannot be detected by existing tests."

That adds a formidable set of objections to those made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West about compulsory screening, or even encouraging voluntary screening, except in those groups most at risk.

If someone discovers that he is seropositive, what can we tell him? What hope can we offer to him? The BMA said:

"Early detection of AIDS infection carries no advantages for the infected individual since no effective treatment is available."

That puts the AIDS problem in an entirely different category from earlier public health campaigns on other diseases. All of us will remember the mass chest X-ray campaign, which was remarkably effective in identifying pulmonary tuberculosis. Even before modern drugs were developed, early detection increased enormously the hope of a cure. We cannot offer any such hope in relation to AIDS. Some deep and sensitive problems are involved and, with the hon. Member for Oldham, West, I counsel the House strongly against any suggestion of compulsion in these matters.

What should we do? In our present state of knowledge, there is no solution to AIDS other than prevention. We can all agree on that. Therefore, I support strongly the campaign launched by my right hon. Friend to warn people about the danger of AIDS. The message is simple: AIDS kills. We should be blunt about it. Such a campaign should follow the general lines of the anti-drugs campaign, which has been much more successful than has been generally acknowledged. I give great credit for that to my right hon. Friend. The campaign should be run by professional communicators. As well as taking a general approach, it should be targeted upon those identifiable groups most at risk. "Just Say No" was the very successful advice against drug abuse targeted at young people. Similar advice should be given to those who are tempted, as the phrase goes, to sleep around.

We should treat those found seropositive as normal human beings and not ostracise them. There is no medical evidence to treat them as lepers, although some elementary precautions should be taken. Discrimination in employment and non-sexual social contact appears entirely unjustified and must be resisted. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Oldham, West on this. For those who are unfortunate enough to develop the full AIDS symptoms we should provide—as indeed we are doing—the full range of medical and nursing support. We should offer them the love and care which the terminally ill always deserve and normally receive.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Although I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that we should not treat people like lepers — everyone would agree with that — is it not extremely difficult to justify a position in which one would condone sexual behaviour by avoiding the fact that many of the figures show that AIDS has been generated because of sexual behaviour of one sort? Surely we should not only try to prevent it from happening, but should try to prevent it from spreading.

Sir David Price: If my hon. Friend is implying that we should once again advocate the merits of celibacy and monogamy, I am entirely with him. Some of us believe that there are strong medical reasons for not entirely liking a society in which sleeping around seems to be the prevailing trend.

We must take seriously the cry for help from the Royal College of Nursing for the terminally ill with AIDS. The college's brief to hon. Members states:

"The reaction of the hospice movement, most of whom exclude patients with AIDS from their care, adds to the burdens and problems of those caring in hospital. Many patients who would be suitable and respond to a hospice environment must remain in hospital blocking beds and obstructing the admission of acutely ill patients due to the inability/unwillingness of some hospices to meet this need."

We must expand this, as unfortunately we anticipate increased numbers of AIDS victims.

I am entirely behind those who argue that within the Health Service we must do more to help those whose days are nearly over and to ensure a quiet, painless and loving end to their lives. I believe strongly in this, which leads me to make an urgent plea to my right hon. Friend to ensure that those hospitals that are in the front line of the battle against this terrible disease have sufficient resources. Like many of us involved in these issues, I have received urgent cries for help from some of the STD clinics, only a mile or two from here. There is a desperate need for increased funding for these clinics, as the number of patients is likely to increase.

There seems to be general agreement among the experts that this terrible disease has a long way to go before it has run its course, and there will be more cases of AIDS in the United Kingdom, but there is as yet no cure for the disease, which is lethal. It is a chilling prognosis, but we must accept it. However, we must not lose our nerve. We must not treat those who are seropositive as lepers. Above all, we must nurse those who develop AIDS with proper love and care. It is no less than our duty. It is clearly laid out in the 25th chapter of St. Matthew's gospel — remember those cautionary words:

"Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me."

11.2 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you have seen from today's press, there is profound concern at certain allegations that were made in this Chamber yesterday that, whereas the Government are trying to suppress publication in Australia of a book about MI5, the same Government have, for nearly four years, taken no proceedings on a series of actual security breaches, involving the security services of which the Prime Minister is the head, because the Attorney-General and the Prime Minister know that such action would necessitate prosecuting a Conservative parliamentary candidate. That is not a matter for you, Sir, but the background to my point of order.

I ask for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on two matters. Have you received any sign from the Attorney-General, who is responsible for ensuring that justice is administered evenly and fairly, that he wishes to make a statement to the House today, as I have requested him to do? Secondly, in view of her alleged complicity in the subordination of national security interests for Conservative party interests, have you received any sign from the Prime Minister that she will make a statement on Monday, as I have asked her to do?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The only matter for me is whether I have received a request from either the Attorney-General or the Prime Minister for permission to make a statement. I have to tell the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I have received no request for any statement to be made, nor has Mr. Speaker. However, the Leader of the House is present and what as been said will be conveyed to the appropriate quarters.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have no wish to interrupt the debate for more than a few minutes. However, as you will readily appreciate, there is growing concern over what appears to be a scandal and it is only right and proper that Ministers should come to the House and explain their position. Will you confirm that there is nothing in the sub judice rule, which is a matter for the Chair, as I understand it, which will prevent the Prime Minister or the Attorney-General from making a statement to the House? Secondly, is there any way in which we can get the Prime Minister or the Attorney-General to make a statement as quickly as possible, because the scandal is growing?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's second question, and the answer to the first had better lie until it arises—when, I hope, Mr. Speaker is in the Chair.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the only scandal what is becoming the "Friday 11 o'clock spurious points of order", when every Friday, when we are debating important measures, Labour Front Bench spokesmen make a——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but he is only indulging in the practice that he is denouncing.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a fact that, under the guise of public interest, this point of order has been raised merely for Labour party interests?

11.5 am

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): Perhaps we can return to the matters that are no less significant than the important point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams).

A year or so ago, drawing on my experience in the United States during a parliamentary recess, I presumed to write an article on AIDS in a distinguished quarterly. It attracted the most severe criticism from a section of the homosexual community and, after a condemnatory editorial in the New Statesman, I was deluged with letters — some bitter, some bewildered — from homosexuals accusing me of deserting them when they were under attack. At the same time, I was, as I still am, constantly bombarded with other letters accusing me, as sponsor of the 1967 Act which ended the criminality of adult homosexuality in private, of responsibility for the near epidemic of AIDS. I regard that charge as absurd, for the Act, ending the most appalling discrimination against hundreds of thousands, if not millions of our fellow citizens, is no more responsible for AIDS than a death certificate is for death or a decree absolute for marriage breakdown.

However, as every experienced Member knows, there should be no expectation of gratitude in politics, least of all for those involved in the reform of the politics that impinge upon human relationships. That is why, repeatedly, Governments have shrunk unfailingly from the minefield and for generations have left it to a handful of those of us on the Back Benches to initiate reforms which consequently, lacking coercive power, lag behind national need.

On AIDS, the Government have acted, and are still acting to no small extent, within the same conventions that have affected many Governments in the nearly 30 years that I have been a Member of the House. In this case, the delayed Government action was prompted by a major miscalculation and a blundering gamble founded on the belief that all that was required was a holding operation. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has already said that the Government have been spending a piffling sum. I believe that that was because they knew that the federal budget in the United States for fighting AIDS was to be $227 million for the fiscal year 1986. Infected by dangerous American optimism, the Government chose to believe that with almost all that sum —only 2 per cent. was intended to be devoted to social and educational research — directed into an aggressive pursuit of a so-called cure or vaccine, the Americans would soon be sending us a magic potion—a package solution —across the Atlantic.

Those of us on both sides of the Atlantic who express other views are dismissed as Cassandras. I regarded then, as I do now, that planned USA programme as a paradigm of the delusion of contemporary western man that technological and scientific progress enables him, by external manipulation, to conquer everything. Because of all that in the United States, and that attitude, no time was therefore to be wasted in finding the real source of the sickness in a high proportion of AIDS victims. A pill or an injection was to be discovered and the terrible symptoms would be suppressed. I have my doubts and my misgivings. Even if a wonder drug yet to be discovered could suppress the symptoms, what other exotic outbreaks will erupt as we evade attempting to deal with the cause?

I ask the House to pause for a moment and to think about the problem of not being able to reach those whom the Government now seek to exhort. The burden of my remarks is that exhortation is not the answer to the problem. It will reach many people, and the Government are to be commended for now endeavouring to reach them, but it will not reach many or those who are perhaps in the highest risk group of all. For, on examining the case histories of many though not, of course, all AIDS victims or on meeting those victims, as I have done in the United States, it is clear that only the purblind could deny that a significant source of their sickness lies, to use biblical language, in the soul, or perhaps, I would say, in the pysche.

The phenomenon of compulsively promiscuous heterosexual Don Juans or of the disturbed minority of homosexual men who fanatically and incessantly seek sex, always unassuaged, and who have hundreds of partners each year — their fumblings often only punctuated by heroin taking—is not to be dismissed moralistically as simply a lack of discipline. Those tragic men, actual or potential AIDS victims, making themselves victims and dangerous to the wider community, are literally sex mad and, like all mad people, they need help, not sententious moralising.

We have had plenty of that with ill-informed calls for compulsory screening from some sections of the Conservative party. The Minister asks for unity, but he should direct his attention to many of his own Back Benchers and to those in his own party who are being sententious and moralistic, and who prompt interventions like the ill-timed intervention that suggested that promiscuity was being deliberately encouraged by some sections of Labour councils. They have also been encouraged by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who attacks those of us who, by legislation, brought about what he calls the permissive—and what I call the more civilised—society. I do not want to dwell, as I could do, any more on that, but some restraint is required on their part.

I do not want to focus excessive attention on those elements in the Conservative party who are adopting such moralistic stances, but I ask the Minister to address his remarks to his own party, as they are not required by us. As the Bible has again been invoked, I should add in passing that I read this week that the Bishop of Birmingham sought to demonstrate in the other place that only conduct that accorded with the Bible would save us from the epidemic. But he demonstrated yet again the folly of injecting didactic morality into our debate, as clearly the safest protection from AIDS for women is for them to be committed lesbians—an injunction not to be found in my reading of the Bible.

It is, of course, easier, although profitless, to be morally sententious than to examine the human condition of those men who compulsively court death through sex. Delving into the complexities of depth psychology, exploring the psychopathology of these obsessional men, may be exceedingly uncongenial. Looking outwards is always less painful than looking in, but in the end a genuine prophylactic may ward off the dangers that AIDS presents to our society far more effectively than the search for what may prove to be a spurious physical antidote.

I do not wish to be misunderstood, although doubtless one always is in these matters: I am in no way minimising the need for all the preventive measures mentioned in the House today or the need for those announced by the Secretary of State as well as those forcefully advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. Certainly the attempt to communicate must be made in the most explicit terms.

The lamentable fact must be faced that, after 11 years at school, some 40 per cent.of the population leave without an O-level. It is no use, therefore, talking to many in parliamentary language, and if words like "f . . . " have to be used, and if we speak of "arseholes" and not anal intercourse, since that is the street language, we must be prepared to explode the taboos of those prissy people in the Conservative party as well as the Tunbridge Wells taboos, knowing that otherwise blameless women and children, among others, will be unnecessarily put at risk. But preventive measures mean more than advertisements or even subsidised French letters, enormously important though they may be.

I ask the House to consider the scenario of the life history of the highest risk group. That group will not be reached by all the advertising in the world. It is a tragic scenario. Born to an unresponsive mother who leaves the baby without her corroboration of his vigour and healthy narcissism, the child can indeed become bereft. If the child does not see himself as the gleam in her eye, for there is no gleam, if she leaves him deprived of stimulating responses, so unempathetic, so indifferent, so remote, such serious deprivation of joyful responses to the child's aliveness can deplete him of self esteem, and leave a residual disposition towards severe empty depression in adult life. If the baby's problems are compounded, as they are judging by what one hears of life histories, by an absent father, the child may not only lack the solid male model with whom he could have identified so as to become a potential father, but may for ever lack the capacity to reassure himself that he could gain from within himself, because he lacks the experience of participating by merger in the calmness of an idealised adult, whose protection would have banished the agonising anxieties that would otherwise fall on any helpless, innocent babe.

Those who mature within such a negative ambience grow up experiencing themselves as boring, prone to ward off their sometimes desperate feelings of deadness by creating pseudo excitement. As toddlers they may become headbangers, in later childhood compulsive masturbators, in adolescence daredevil activators, and as adults they are seen—if people have eyes to see it—desperately seeking to feel alive by frenzied sexual or drug activities.

Those are the lifestyles of many of those afflicted by AIDS, for they are bereft of the psychic structure that can regulate inner need and excitement, and have become victims of the need to have the over-stimulation of constant, manic excitation. Without some such excitements, so precarious and fragile are their selves that they fear that they will dissolve. Constant, incessant skin contact reassures them that they are still whole and not disintegrating.

In this country there are, in unprecedented numbers, hundreds of thousands of unloved, destabilised children growing up in broken and one-parent families who consequently endure the sort of wounds that I have sought to describe. We are placing them at risk, as we have placed so many young men and women of today at risk, because the dominant goal, as preached in our society and as starkly preached by this Government, is to grab what we can from the cornucopia of the consumer society. It is with such single-mindedness that support is being denied to our crumbling family system.

One result is that this generation in Britain, as in America, has revealed its unique capacity to have wrested from homosexuality, which has always existed, a new phenomenon, the visitation of AIDS. The malaise which brings this curse will not be wholly cured by expensive anti-AIDS jabs, imported some years hence from American drug companies. The psyche is not so easily bypassed. If, in 19th century fashion, we delude ourselves —I fear that there is a grave danger of our doing so— into thinking that physical science will resolve all, we shall pay dearly for our hubris. There is a desperate need to fear our own feelings less and to desist in the fashionable scorn of psychotherapy and counselling. The under-funded and ramshackle state of our psychiatric and psychotherapeutic services is spelt out today by every child psychiatrist, now overwhelmed by horrifying child abuse — itself a symptom of family breakdown, which has been opened up by Esther Rantzen's constructive programme.

Now AIDS is revealing how little help is available to support both AIDS carriers and sufferers and, as I am urging, to modify the behaviour of the most compulsively promiscuous who, to the danger of us all, certainly cannot be reached by exhortation. Ideally, psychotherapists and trained counsellors should be available at every STD clinic in the land. They should be available to support the desperately needed and presently unfunded community care, without which central London hospitals would certainly be overwhelmed.

How absurd it is that institutions with actual o potential training capacity — I do not speak, as the Minister did, about training given by a handful of clinical psychologists — such as the Maudsley, the Portman clinic, the St. George's department of psychotherapy, the Cassel hospital at Richmond, the centre for research at Brent——

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Abse: In a moment. Those associations, together with the British Association of Counselling and the valuable Albany Society, consider themselves to be under financial threat or know that they are hopelessly underfunded. The Government should do more than deal with education in the way that has been shown today— valuable as that clearly will be. The Government must coordinate and activate psychological and counselling services to embark upon funded crash training for such purposes.

Dr. Miller: I should like an assurance from my hon. Friend that the counselling services, the psycho-analytic treatment and various other aspects which he mentioned are not instead of but in addition to vaccines or medicines to cure the condition.

Mr. Abse: Of course. Although there was some admonition from my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West on the issue, I can well understand the Government believing that the main research into vaccines will come out of the United States of America. Since we must have some sense of priority in this country, one of the most urgent priorities, if we are to deal with AIDS —I hope I am not saying it excessively pejoratively—is to deal with centres of infection. If we do not do deal with that, we will find ourselves having expended £10 million, £20 million or £50 million on advertising and still not having reached the people whom we wish to reach.

We have a national emergency. There is a need for the Government to turn to all those with the skills to help ward off the epidemic. There should be something such as a Government-sponsored Standing Committee, including the Royal Society of Psychiatry, the Institute of Psychoanalysis, the St. George Psychotherapeutic Centre, the British Association of Counselling, and so on.

If we relegate psychotherapy and counselling to a mere appendage of the armoury which we create in our attempt to shield us from the epidemic, we will be doomed to failure before we start. There are no short cuts. Saatchi and Saatchi advertising will not cope with the problems, beneficial though they may be to the formerly-named London Rubber Company, which incidentally, given its murky, monopolistic past, could immediately overcome its expressed reparative quilt over its anticipated profits by funding voluntary counselling services and by promoting stronger prophylactic and self-sealing condoms and stop worrying about its product image.

If we are to move forward, for example, to voluntary testing, as has been canvassed, we will need real counsellors to cope with it. We do not have them. A large proportion of the dedicated people who are striving to help at the moment in hospitals and outside have very few skills open to them to deal with the difficult problems that I have been attempting to describe. Therefore, I hope that the Government will take a lurch to look at existing psychotherapeutic and counselling opportunities that exist. Otherwise we will find that advertising may go on for years, but we will not reach those who do not have the capacity or the freedom to respond to the pleas made by the Minister.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Nearly 20 right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. Unless there is brevity in speech making, some of them will be disappointed.

11.26 am

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Whatever the outcome of this debate, one thing we can be sure of is that the lead given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of

[Mr. David Crouch]

State for Social Services will be remembered not only for the content of his speech but for the manner and style of making this a co-operative national approach. The lead given by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) will also be remembered for its degree of co-operation.

I speak today as a member of the Medical Research Council. We are talking about a problem that is new in our lives. Acquired immune deficiency syndrome was first described in the United States in 1981. Isolation of viruses from AIDS patients was reported for the first time barely two years ago, in 1984, by two teams of scientists working independently, in France and in the United States. It was only this year that we gave the name to this human immuno-deficiency virus—HIV. The HIV virus kills T-lymphocytes, a key part of the body's immune system, and progressively destroys the body's ability to fight infection.

What do we need to do, and what has been done to date in research into fighting this deadly disease? We need to develop vaccines against the virus, and specific anti-viral therapies. In 1983 the Medical Research Council set up a working party on AIDS when only a handful of cases had been reported in Britain. The aim of the working party was to review progress in research and to encourage co-operation among those working on the problem. That co-operation is important. We have succeeded in isolating the virus. Initially this was done in France and in the United States—Dr. Gallo in Washington and Dr. Montagnier in Paris.

We are learning about the evolution of the virus. We still have to learn how it arose and how it might be expected to change in future. Studies of the molecular virology of HIV are central to the efforts aimed at preparing a vaccine. Isolation of the viruses has led to the development of antibody tests. In the case of HIV, the antibodies produced are not very effective in fighting the disease, but they provide a marker for infection. They help us to find out whether a person has been affected, and that is how it is possible to identify such persons. This is an important breakthrough in the bare five years that we have known of this disease in human society.

We cannot yet reliably test for the virus in a person's blood, but we can reliably test for the antibody that the body produces when the virus is present. A person can be affected before the antibody appears, and hon. Members have touched on that point. Several months—we do not know the exact period—can elapse before even the testing can find out whether the antibody is there. This breakthrough in finding the antibody is being used to test blood donations. Such donations can be screened to ensure their safety and be treated afterwards in making blood products such as Factor VIII, which is essential in the treatment of haemophiliacs, so that any virus present can be absolutely destroyed. This is of immense importance in the treatment of haemophiliacs and to those of us who need blood donations. Safety has been achieved—a great achievement.

Many scientists are working on AIDS research in Britain. This work is concentrated in London at two of our teaching hospitals, the Middlesex and St. Mary's, and at St. Stephens hospital in Fulham. I shall mention the names of two scientists who have done great work in Britain and internationally—Dr. Richard Tedder, a distinguished virologist at Middlesex hospital medical school, and Professor Robin Weiss, director of the Institute of Cancer Research. Two years ago they went to the Medical Research Council for funds to make progress in research into the antibodies. They did not ask for a lot. They wanted £230,000 spread over three years. They got it. Their work led to the successful antibody test. In this work, as had been mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, they worked in close collaboration with a major private sector pharmaceutical firm, Wellcome Diagnostics Ltd. I should declare an interest, as I am a director of the pharmaceutical firm. At St. Mary's hospital, MRC funds are provided to support clinical trials to find new methods of identifying the virus in blood and to assess the effects of any new treatment being tried. There are no good prospects on the horizon.

Drugs in the treatment of AIDS, even dangerous ones with serious toxic effects, have been tried on very ill patients in the United States. The federal Food and Drug Administration allows the use of otherwise non-proven drugs as safe in certain circumstances as a last resort. I believe, although I am not sure, that in this country such treatment is allowed with the DHSS and Committee on Safety of Medicines approval. There is so much we need to know and so much more to be done. The question I would ask as I digress on the research aspects is: are we doing enough?

Dr. M. S. Miller: The hon. Gentleman said that the drugs are used as a last resort. Does he realise that the situation was exactly the same with insulin when it was first discovered? It was a highly dangerous, highly toxic drug and was used only when it was expected that the patient would die within the next two or three days. We know what has happened to that substance since.

Mr. Crouch: I accept the hon. Gentleman's experienced medical opinion in this matter, on which he is an authority. He has made a helpful contribution. I would only emphasise that this must not be left to the individual practitioners on the spot. They must have approval from the centre if such dangerous drugs are to be tried in what is virtually an experiment on a person suffering from a deadly disease. Are we doing enough in research? We must ask the Government that question. We are facing a crisis of science. We must make another breakthrough to develop a vaccine. There should be much more research at Government level, at the Medical Research Council, in our medical research centres, in the teaching hospitals and in our universities.

We need to step up considerably our work in east Africa, where AIDS has spread widely. I must correct a point made in the House today that AIDS is found primarily among homosexual men and those who indulge in intravenous drug activity. That is not the position in east Africa. The proportion of men to women with AIDS in Africa is one to one. It is a terrifying prospect for the rest of us if the disease should develop in that way here.

The Medical Research Council has an important unit in the Gambia studying the AIDS problem, but there is not much AIDS in west Africa and in the Gambia. We need to increase our research activity in east Africa. The MRC is supporting important work in Lusaka at the university teaching hospital. People are desperate for help in that part of Africa and in Lusaka. They need not only research aid from the MRC, but another sort of aid—overseas aid. I understand that the Overseas Development Administration is aware of this problem and is helping. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say whether that is so. I understand also that the World Health Organisation has been alerted to the problem.

We are facing a crisis of frightening proportions. It is not an exaggeration to say that AIDS is a major disease which could engulf the nation and spread worldwide. It is only five years old. The average time needed to develop a new drug is usually 15 years. Normally about 1,500 products must be developed before one is thought to be successful. Such developments in the drug industry, and such success after perhaps 15 years, can come only when we know what we are trying to cure, but only in the last year have we found the virus. We have only just got to first base. We must intensify our research efforts. Huge figures have been mentioned today. Our expenditure in the MRC on AIDS research is £300,000 a year. A further £300,000 is provided by the health departments. That is just over £500,000 a year to fight a potential disaster.

Much more money is allocated by the health departments to programmes to control the progress of this epidemic. I very much welcome the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the greatly increased amount to combat the progress of the epidemic and to the control and cure of the disease. I want to confine my remarks solely to the research programme.

In October 1985, just over a year ago, the secretary of the MRC, Sir James Gowans, went to see the Secretary of State for Education and Science—my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph)—and asked for an additional £500,000 for research into AIDS to support our epidemiological research. The health departments agreed to provide £300,000 and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils advised my right hon. Friend that the balance—a mere £200,000—should be provided in addition to the existing science budget and grant-in-aid to the MRC. My right hon. Friend did not agree. He said that the money would have to come from our existing budget.

On 17 November Sir James Gowans went to see the new Secretary of State for Education and Science, and again asked for more money. In the MRC's view, the national emergency that we are facing is such that additional funds must be made available. It is now considered that in order to pursue the priorities identified by the working party of the MRC an additional £1 million a year is needed. The matter is urgent. I hope that the Government—I say the Government because this embraces more than one Department—will recognise that this is one decision that cannot be left to the Treasury.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Does my hon. Friend agree that, because of the concentrated effort that is needed for research, the best help would be to give support to the considerable effort in the United States and other countries, such as France? Does he agree that our best prospect is to devote our resources to education? Bearing in mind the exponential growth of the disease and the long period over which it remains dormant, we could use the time to delay the onset of the disease and to prevent it spreading and growing. We could then save thousands of lives five years hence.

Mr. Crouch: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is the aspect of controlling the progress of an epidemic. My concern is the attempt, through research, to find a cure. There is something to be said for both. Money is required for both areas. The greatest amount of money will be required in the education process, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said.

I want to say something about collaboration with the pharmaceutical industry. I have emphasised the word "collaboration" already. The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that in this country that industry, of which I am a member, spends about £500 million a year on research. That is valuable work. I have already mentioned the valuable co-operation between the MRC and the Wellcome Foundation.

I must say in this important debate that the time has come for a great co-operative effort by scientists, whether they are working in the Government, the universities or the pharmaceutical industry. We have a wealth of knowledge and facilities in the private sector. This is not a time for secrecy between companies. It is not a time for secrecy between companies and the Government. We are at war with a new virus. We must get ourselves on to a war footing to tackle the great problem. We must get together and share our knowledge. We must draw on the best brains in the country. A national effort is needed, and it must be international as well. Those are some of the questions to which the committee of my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Whitelaw must give its most urgent consideration.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am privileged to follow the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch). We have been treated to a seminal contribution to today's debate and I am sure that the Hansard report of the hon. Member's speech will be carefully studied by us all. The hon. Gentleman's work in the Medical Research Council and pharmaceutical industry is well known and has brought a valuable insight to this morning's discussions. I extend those comments also to the contributions made by the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). Both made statesmanlike speeches and both recognised that there is a need for all-party consensus to confront and attack this infection. In so far as I am able, I shall subscribe to that view and try to seek to strengthen the Government's arm in any way possible in the coming weeks and months as the grim story of this infection unfolds.

It is certainly true to say that everybody involved in the medical profession, voluntary groups, charities, infected groups and the general public have, for some time, been waiting for a lead from the Government. I believe that the Government have taken the first step this morning. Obviously, some of us would like to see the momentum maintained and increased. However, I recognise that the first steps have been taken, and I welcome and endorse the Government's view and the announcements made this morning.

I have been frustrated and scraping away for the past six months tabling parliamentary questions on AIDS. I had come to the conclusion that not enough was being done and not enough money was being spent. I hope that we can set any such recriminations behind us and look forward positively to the future.

I certainly think that the infection of the 500 or 600 patients who have contracted the disease and the 30,000 who have been infected by the virus could have been both predicted and prevented. Certainly, the disease is not curable, as we know. A life sentence of infection for carriers is a serious matter and the Government—any Government—should and must respond to it.

The tone of this morning's debate is heartening. It has been constructive. We have not only a medical problem but a social problem on our hands. The language and adjectives that we use are very important, not just to the at-risk groups but to the wider public as well. There is a great deal of confusion, ignorance and fear, and we must be careful about how we tackle the problem for that reason.

The popular press has dealt with this matter in a sensational way and it has done itself no credit. It will take us many months to try to redress some of the damage it may have done. The infected people with the full-blown symptoms and the at-risk groups are immediately exposed to tremendous social pressure. In some cases they are persecuted, threatened and abused. I fear that if that continues indefinitely they will tend to be driven underground. If one is a member of the homosexual community, the best way to obtain cover is to acquire a wife. If one acquires a wife and is carrying the virus there is another vicious screw—[Interruption.]—turn of the screw in the spiral of infection. One has to be careful about the language used in such debates in more ways than one.

I subscribe to the view put forward by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that infection of the general population is not necessarily inevitable if action is taken quickly. Indeed, one of the things that has come across in the past few weeks, since television interest has been stimulated, is that there are many people who may have had isolated, casual sex with prostitutes, or whatever, during the past 18 months and who are now suffering a great deal of fear because some of the stories in the press suggest that they may be infected. If I am right—I hope that somebody with more medical knowledge will put me right if I am wrong—the chance of people who are not in one of the at—risk groups but who have previously engaged in casual heterosexual sex catching the virus is very remote. That is not true today. It will never be safe again to indulge in casual, heterosexual sex. As the Secretary of State said, people have the answer in their own hands by changing their habits in future. It would be helpful for somebody in authority to say that, to date, people who may have had casual isolated sex in the past are unlikely to be at risk. Any thought of them rushing to flood STD clinics for testing is a waste of time and they should not worry.

Mr. Strang: There is one exception to that. If the incident was with an Edinburgh prostitute, sadly there is a high chance of infection.

Mr. Kirkwood: It is dangerous to make sweeping generalisations. I am grateful for that correction. I hope to deal with Edinburgh later.

The announcements made by the Government this morning are extremely welcome. As the Secretary of State said, information is the only vaccine that we have at the moment. I hope that his leaflets will be clear about the risks, the transmission routes and the preventive measures that are necessary. However, I hope that he will also carefully consider using some of the valuable space in the leaflets to dispel some of the myths that I have been speaking about. I hope, too, that he will desist from any moralising because, if the leaflets are going to young people, the last thing that they want to hear is a dose of moralising, which could erect a barrier between them and getting the message.

I wonder how long the Secretary of State envisages the television campaign that he announced this morning lasting. I hope that it will not be of short duration. I believe that we need a five to 10-year span of advertising. The problem is with us, and, as has been said, even if no one else was infected from today on, we should still have a serious problem. The comparisop with the Trustee Savings Bank and British Gas flotation advertising campaigns is entirely valid and is not exceptional.

The Secretary of State will probably be aware that the British Medical Association general practitioners committee, in an emergency resolution only last night, came out in favour of issuing rubber protective sheaths through surgeries and clinics. I would go further and make them available through retail chemists. That is a very important weapon in the Secretary of State's armoury to which he should have recourse at an early stage.

The work done by the Terrence Higgins Trust and, in Scotland, by the Scottish AIDS Monitor organisation, is crucial. Their counselling, education and training and particularly their influence within their own peer group to try to influence sexual behaviour and patterns is crucial. I hope that the Government will actively consider giving more support in that direction.

It is important that at an early stage the Government promote some sort of co-ordinated charity umbrella. We know of the experience in New York, where there are now nearly 90 different, separate, fragmented charities all over the place. They are trying to do their best in difficult situations because they are competing with one another. The Government have a duty in that regard. I know that it is difficult and that ordinarily it is not the work of Government, but it is important that we get a recognised umbrella organisation. There are funds to be raised for research, counselling and so on. That voluntary effort has a valuable role to play, but if it is fragmented it will be vitiated and be the less effective for it.

If we are embarking on a professional advertising campaign, the tendency will be for people to come to the STD clinics, the surgeries and other places in response to it. The facilities must be there to look after them when they come—screening and testing must be available. There must be adequate resources for staff and the clinics themselves must be adequately equipped with test equipment such as the so-called "System 3" equipment, which is necessary for modern testing. As a pharmacist, I believe that the antibody tests will give way eventually to much better antigen and viral isolation techniques. If we do that, the testing equipment must be kept nearer to the test place. The Government must not rule out the possibility of that development in the near future.

Staffing and counsellors and the Public Health Laboratory Service will play a vital role, too. I hope that the Government will respond to the story in The Guardian about a £4 million cut. If that cut had an impact on AIDS-related work, I should be very concerned indeed. I endorse the view, taken probably on both sides of the House now, that any screening must be on a voluntary basis. At this stage mass screening makes no practical sense. It would be regrettable to let the idea take hold that it is possible to screen immigrants, too.

I should now like to refer to those who suffer full-blown symptoms of the syndrome. I add my commendation to those working in places such as St. Mary's and Middlesex, not just the medical but the caring staff, because nurses have been infected during their work. Their work is for the whole of our present-day society and should not go unrecognised. We need social workers, too, and buildings. I underline the plea for help for the London Lighthouse hospice and similar organisations. Their work is invaluable. The Government could do much to stimulate and promote their efforts.

The hon. Member for Canterbury made an eloquent plea for more money for research. He can make that plea much more competently than me. I agree with everything that he said.

On the question of the money that is available, I should like to refer the Secretary of State to the work done by the College of Health. I am sure that he has seen the figures. It set out a sensible, short-term regime of expenditure embracing £20 million or £30 million for advertising, £10 million or £11 million for health authorities, £10 million for voluntary groups, £4 million for staffing, £5 million for London because there are special problems there, and about £10 million for research. From my perspective of the problem, I believe that those are the amounts of money required. It would involve a tenfold increase over what was being spent before this morning's announcements were made.

I now refer specifically to Scotland. The Scottish situation is different. Diseases such as AIDS have a different profile and incidence, depending on the host community in which they operate and take hold. The situation in Scotland is now unique. I am sure that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) will deploy the Edinburgh problem at greater length.

As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East said in an intervention, the drug community in Edinburgh is now nearly more than 50 per cent. AIDS-carrying. That has real implications for the whole of Scotland. The evidence is that in Scotland as a whole we have had 19 or 20 syndrome patients and 13 of them have died. Almost 5,000 are virus victims. In Edinburgh, nearly 2,000 people are virus carriers, and at least one third—probably more, and maybe as many as 90 per cent.—will eventually die. That is at least 700 people. Heroin has traditionally been cheaper on the west coast and the drug addicts go on the blue trains from Edinburgh's Haymarket station to Queen Street station in Glasgow and they take their dirty needles with them. They sample the heroin before they take it back to their friends, and the result is that there are now roughly 154 virus carriers among the drug community in Glasgow.

I should like to congratulate Scottish Television on the work that it has been doing and the programmes it has been making. According to its figures, some 8,000 to 12,000 people in Glasgow use intravenous heroin. Glasgow is on the precipice of a disaster of immense proportions which will occur if the infected population from Edinburgh enable the virus to take hold in Glasgow. No other city in Britain is facing such a disaster. The problem in Scotland stems from Edinburgh and the virus infection is creeping up the east coast. In Fife there are about 40 virus carriers, there are 140 in Dundee and 35 in Aberdeen. They can all be traced back to Edinburgh. On the east coast of Scotland, 26 babies are now carrying the virus.

I was pleased to see that the Secretary of State for Scotland was added to the Minister's Cabinet Committee. That is a useful step. The Cabinet Committee must urgently turn its attention to Glasgow. I understand the difficulties that the Minister will face in issuing new needles for old and in considering Methadone substitution and other measures—all the sensible recommendations made in the McClelland report. Implementing those measures will give rise to all sorts of problems and the Minister will receive criticism from all quarters. At the very least, will he consider using Glasgow as a pilot project? He could say to his critics from the Right—if that is the direction from which criticisms come—that this is to be tried in Glasgow and that it has been tried in Amsterdam. I know that there are problems in Amsterdam, but the Minister could try it in Glasgow for two years to see whether it works. If crime increases and Glasgow becomes a magnet for drug abuse for the whole of Europe, the project could be stopped. In the immediate future, the Minister could isolate Glasgow and use it as a pilot project for the McClelland committee recommendations.

The Minister does not have much time if he decides to do that. If he leaves it beyond the spring he will be too late, because in Edinburgh the problem is beyond control. Drug addiction in Scotland is not the same sort of Hampstead suburb activity that it is in London. In the main, hard line intravenous heroin is being used, and the down and outs do not have letter boxes for leaflets or electrical plugs for television sets and there is little chance of getting through to people like that in any other way. I make an earnest plea to the Minister to look at the special circumstances in Glasgow.

I think that it was Napoleon who said that battles can be won or lost in moments. In terms of the battle for Glasgow and the impact of AIDS on that city, the moment is now, and if the Government do not seize the opportunity they will never have it again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The only short speech that we have had all day was on a point of order. I hope that hon. Members will try harder.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): I agree with the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who said that we have a social as well as a medical problem. He expressed one view about that on which my thinking leads me to the opposite conclusion from him, but I shall develop that point later.

I am sorry that I missed part of the debate, both because of the apparent discourtesy to hon. Members who spoke and because I missed what they said. However, I have heard most of the debate and all hon. Members that I heard stressed the dire straits of those who suffer from this disease. We can but be desperately sorry for anybody who contracts it, however he contracted it and whatever our feelings about how he did so. All hon. Members have also stressed the dire straits to which Britain might be reduced if we do not succeed in our efforts to stop the predicted growth of the disease. I agree and am thinking not just in medical terms, but in terms of the misery to the ever-increasing numbers who may be subjected to the disease.

I totally accept all that the Minister said. This is a public health challenge and is of a size, urgency and importance that cannot be exaggerated. I should like to introduce an additional factor. What I propose to say is not in place of anything that has been said, but in addition to it. In addition to a public health challenge, we have at least as important and as urgent a challenge to the nation's morals. Of course we must do what we have to do to meet the public health challenge, and we must all co-operate in every way that we can to find an answer to that challenge.

Hon. Members need also to ask themselves, and to ask everybody else who cares about it to ask themselves, at least two other questions. Why do we have this dreaded danger? Why do we have to face the undoubted need to direct to this cause resources that are sorely needed to help others to improve or recover their health?

Part of the answer to those questions must lie in the questions to which my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) addressed himself—what he called the crisis of science. So be it. Of course we must do all that we can to find the answers, in so far as those answers lie in scientific matters, but I beg the House and the people of this country not to overlook one other factor. A very material factor in the spreading of this disease and of the misery that it causes is that so many have strayed so far and so often from what were taught as the normal moral values until the 1960s and from what are still taught, thank heaven, by a great many people.

I stress that I said the "normal" moral values. I do not want to moralise. I used the word "normal" deliberately. Very few people are ever good enough or clever enough to live up to the strictest sets of morals all their lives, but at least until the early 1960s there was always some sort of guide. We were led to believe that it was good to live up to what was regarded as normal. However, since the early 1960s I am afraid that by so many, especially perhaps those who have had the use of the means of communications, that has been described as "old hat". With other right hon. and hon. Members, I have seen hon. Members sneering at any suggestion that some importance is to be placed upon moral values. I hope that they are starting to think again carefully about that.

Whatever the discussion may be about how the disease is spread, the two words that crop up over and over again are "sex" and "drugs". I do not need to be more explicit than that to make my point. It would not be very difficult to make it even more forcefully, but the fact is that any discussion—never mind about the purely scientific basis—on how the disease is spread from one person to another automatically introduces sex or drugs, or both.

I do not think that anybody could gainsay that this change in our habits—I choose to call them values—has happened for a variety of identifiable reasons. There are some who have set out deliberately to destabilise society by corrupting the young with sex and drugs. If we are not willing to recognise that fact, we shall continue to turn a blind eye. Not many people are involved in that, but we should be examining all the causes. I just hope that those who have been involved will, if they have any decency, quake at the thought of the devil that they have unleashed.

Others have used both sex and drugs for the purpose of making money. Although I earn my living as a lawyer and have spent 27 years as a Member of Parliament, I find it difficult to find words that preserve the kind of moderation that I am trying to preserve and yet adequately describe what I am talking about. But they are not the only ones who are guilty. Among the guilty are those who, since the early 1960s, have actively promoted what they choose to call "the permissive society." In this Chamber I have even heard it called "the civilised society". They have actively promoted every form of deviation from those normal values until the mystery and the beauty of sex have been dragged down to the levels of what we have to talk about in this debate, and in the combating of this fearful social problem.

Mr. Abse: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman is addressing his remarks to those of us who put into effect this legislation, does he not think, as a distinguished Conservative Member of Parliament, that at a time when the Opposition note that both unemployment and interest rates have increased since 1979, he should tell us, since he is echoing the chairman of the Conservative party, that the only perception that the people of this country have is that the only people who cannot keep their trousers up are those who are either in the vicinity of the Conservative party or right at the heart of the Conservative party? Perhaps he will address his remarks to them and not to those of us on this side of the House who sponsored the legislation.

Sir Ian Percival: When the hon. Gentleman reads the Official Report he will realise that I was making a perfectly general observation, but if he feels that it applies to him, so be it—if the cap fits, he must wear it.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that there had been encouraging noises from the Independent Broadcasting Authority. I am glad to hear that, but we need rather more than encouraging noises. A week ago today I was watching the late night tennis highlights on the television. When that finished, instead of switching off I made the mistake of turning the dial. Although I spent five years in the Army, I was aghast at what I saw. There was a yellow triangle or something in the corner, but that would merely attract some viewers. It was neither funny nor clever and could not by any stretch of the imagination be described as having anything artistic about it. It was salacious, it was filthy and it was deplorable. That is the kind of thing that the IBA allows to be shown. People talk solemnly about intellectual and artistic freedom and then wonder why rape has increased by 29 per cent. in the past year. They should start looking at the facts and stop all this airy-fairy nonsense about artistic licence. When there is an element of art that is fine, but when it is just salacious filth we should face up to it, and let the IBA, which can do far more about it than we can, put a stop to it and put the people who foist this stuff on the public in their place.

We must all do all the things that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that we must do, but we must do more as well. My plea to and through the House is that we should strike at the very roots of the evil, not just the scientific causes but the social causes. By "we", I mean all of us. I have mentioned a few who I believe have contributed to the evil, but we must all try to help solve this social problem. There is a wonderful opportunity for the churches to take the lead in helping the country back to some moral values, but I do not resile from what I have said. I am not pointing the finger at other people and saying that they should do it. We must all do what we can, but the first necessity is to recognise the causes. Those who try to set aside or rule out the argument for moral values not only fail to look the facts in the face. They will never find the answers to the problem, although I accept that they seek those answers as fervently as I do. None of us will get anywhere in seeking answers until we face this aspect of the matter.

The immediate purpose and gain of a return to what I have described as normal standards would be to reduce the number of people who contract or pass on the disease, but the long-term gain will be to make ours not only a more healthy nation, but a happier and a better one.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): The speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) gives me a very good lead in. Whenever the Conservative party starts talking about moral values, we can be sure that a general election is imminent. I shall have more to say about that later in my speech.

The Secretary of State, both in opening the debate and on earlier occasions, has appealed for an all-party approach to these matters. I agree with a good deal of what he said. There is indeed a limit to what Governments can do to contain, organise and control people's behaviour, especially their sexual behaviour.

Ministers should beware of certain Conservative Members adopting the posture that was put into words by the right hon. and learned Member for Southport, who attempted to lecture people on their sexual behaviour and morals. They need no such lectures from Conservative Members in particular. I should like to ask the Minister about an early-day motion which has been signed by a considerable number of Conservative Members. It concerns the desirability of repealing the Sexual Offences Act 1967, which allows certain behaviour between consenting adults in private. I want public schools to be abolished, which would go some way towards solving the problem that we are discussing. If we get into that kind of posture, two can play at that game.

Yesterday I had the great privilege of seeing what Scottish Television has done to reveal the facts about the great scourge that we face. I had the privilege, if it can be called a privilege, of seeing what it has done to expose the great dangers of the disease. I was almost physically sick as a result of what I saw, and I am a pretty hardened operator in these matters, but that is just the type of propaganda that is required.

I had not realised until yesterday how rapidly this incurable disease is spreading in Scotland, where it is spreading no less quickly than in other parts of the world. It is a certain killer and, at the moment, incurable. It has rightly been described as the greatest threat to public health this century, yet the public remain woefully ignorant about its causes and symptoms and what they can do to avoid its deadly clutches. One common misconception is that it is almost entirely restricted to homosexuals and drug addicts. Scottish Television has gone some way towards educating the British people that it is a heterosexual menace as well.

Researchers have told us that the circumstances in Scotland are special in many ways. I understand why the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) is absent, but if he had stayed I would have asked him whether his all-party Select Committee, which is to consider the problem of AIDS, has a remit which extends to Scotland.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Hamilton: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand if I do not give way.

If the Select Committee's remit does not extend to Scotland, I hope that we in Scotland will exercise initiative and set up an ad hoc Select Committee, as consideration of the matter is desperately urgent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) mentioned, in an intervention, the provision of clean needles. The Government must make an urgent decision in that respect. The same applies to the provision of free, stronger condoms. We must not be squeamish about the use of language. If necessary, four-letter words must be used to show the dangers arising from this problem.

The Scottish Television researchers tell us that the AIDS virus came to Edinburgh in 1983 via a United States sailor who shared infected needles with a large group of addicts. New York has everything—just name it and it has it, and it sends it over here. That is how we got the problem in Edinburgh. It is spreading like a forest fire. There are 40 cases in Fife, 140 in Dundee and 35 in Aberdeen, and those figures are probably already underestimates. Glasgow has a drug-taking population of between 8,000 and 12,000. The city faces a terrifying problem, which is worsening rapidly. We are told that there are about 1,500 to 2,000 virus carriers in Edinburgh, about 700 of whom will die over the next four years.

What action is being taken to fight the menace? The Scottish AIDS advisory committee recommended that clean needles should be provided for addicts and that new money should be found to tackle the problem. No decision has been made about the needles and we have had little sign that the Government view the problem with sufficient seriousness.

Whenever we ask for increased public expenditure the Government reply, almost immediately and mechanically, "You cannot solve a problem by throwing money at it." As a generalisation that is true, but ever since 1979 the Government have thrown money indiscriminately at the police and the law and order services and, despite the enormous sums spent in that area, the crime figures have rocketed remorselessly year after year. The latest figures published yesterday show that the position is getting no better. The Government should not use the old excuse about throwing money at problems. Much more money must be spent on this extremely serious matter. If it is not spent now, we shall have to spend fortunes in the decades to come.

When we faced the threat of a war over the Falkland Islands the Prime Minister said that she would solve the problem "no matter what the cost." We had the war and hundreds of men on both sides died, but the problem is still unresolved. Hundreds of millions of pounds—perhaps thousands of millions of pounds—of public money were spent on that endeavour. All right, it won the Prime Minister a general election, though the British people probably regret that now. The point is that the Government can find the money when the will is there and when they see a danger as a paramount threat to national survival.

The spread of AIDS is as serious as, if not more serious than, what faced us in the Falkland Islands. The Prime Minister should go on television now and say, "We shall solve this problem, no matter what the cost." That would be a measure of the Government's seriousness. They should not appeal too much for an all-party approach to the matter. With the imminence of an election, everything —but everything—is seen by the Government as a party political matter, whether that be Brent council, Mr. Grant in Islington, the BBC or even the Church of England. All those matters are in the political arena.

The Opposition reserve their judgment on this point. The Government's seriousness on this matter will be tested by the amount of resources that they are prepared to commit. The public understand, and will increasingly understand, the enormous seriousness of the disease. The Government's sincerity in their approach to the disease will be tested by the Prime Minister's edict, "We shall tackle it, no matter what the cost."

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) has had a very long and distinguished parliamentary career. I am sorry that he is leaving the House at the end of this Parliament, but I am equally sorry that he sometimes leaves his charm outside and injects rather more bitterness into his remarks than becomes him. He was especially unfair when he attacked my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) for what was essentially a sensible, moderate and reasonable speech.

I do not pretend to the medical knowledge of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who is a pharmacist, or that of my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), who spoke from the standpoint of the Medical Research Council. I want to make my remarks along the same lines as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central was entirely correct to remind us—albeit with a little force—that no party has a monopoly on chastity or on moral values. It would be preposterous to suggest that. However, there is nothing wrong in recognising that the majority of the people in this country attest to or subscribe to some sort of faith—Moslem, Christian or Jewish. All the great faiths teach certain moral lessons. To face those lessons in such a debate is not attempting to be holier-than-thou or to be pious. Most of us have fallen by the wayside from time to time, but that does not mean that we do not recognise the fact that it is a good thing—as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport said—to have standards and aims to which we can aspire.

Although I believe that only a proper sense of compassion motivated the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) in his reforming zeal—much good has come of it —it behoves him to recognise that all has not been good and that those who have made money from titillating the baser sensibilities of people over the past 20 years or more, the evidence of which is in every bookshop and bookstall in the land and frequently on our television screens, have done small service to the community, even though they may have lined their own pockets. We must recognise that those people bear much responsibility for the terrible dilemma which the nation faces today and which the House is debating.

We must also recognise that to have a proper and burning concern for those who are suffering from this terrible disease and to have—if I can put it in the Christian context—a total sympathy and desire to help the sinner does not mean that we do not recognise that there is such a thing as sin. We must also recognise that the two words which have cropped up time and time again in the debate, and which crop up whenever this subject is discussed, are sex and drugs. What are we talking about? We are considering a problem which has been exacerbated by certain homosexual practices and promiscuity. I agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who said that the latter—promiscuity—is probably the greater scourge. It does no service to put that to one side and not to debate it when we are discussing this disease. It must be recognised.

I am sorry that neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor my hon. Friend the Minister for Health is here, but I should tell my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, who is no doubt taking copious notes to pass on to senior Ministers, that some aspects of the orchestration of the Government's campaign give cause for anxiety, although there is universal approval for the general drift of the Secretary of State's remarks in his positive and sensible speech this morning. I do not contemplate lightly the fact that many of my constituents of advanced years will suddenly have fairly alarming literature thrust through their letter boxes, and I hope that some thought will be given to exempting some aged sections of the population, who live in identifiable areas, from receiving the sort of material that will be put out. We must also recognise that some of the literature will have a disturbing effect on young children. It is especially important to have close consultation with the education authorities about precisely what is said and how it is said.

I said that most people subscribe to a faith. I hope that the Government will talk to the leaders of all religious faiths and give them the opportunity to contribute to the literature produced so that it can be seen that there is a recognisable and perfectly acceptable moral dimension.

Although I understand why the Government and everyone else say, "If people cannot desist from certain practices they should take precautions," there is a slight danger that it could be equated with the Government's saying, "It is bad to steal, but if you must, please wear gloves." We must get the message across much more carefully than that. We can talk about using condoms, but I hope that the Government will ensure that every contraceptive device carries a health warning on the packet. I see no reason why it should not say, "Promiscuity can kill." There is no reason why we should not adopt a warning similar to the Government health warnings on packets of cigarettes.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West might take issue with me on the moral dimension, but he said that codes of behavious must be changed. He made a fair point when he said that we shall overcome this terrible scourge that threatens to engulf the planet only if people change their behaviour——

Mr. Meacher indicated assent.

Mr. Cormack: I am glad to see the hon. Gentleman nodding. He does not think that I have distorted his words. As we are at one across the Chamber on this—I think that few hon. Members would disagree—let us say to those who wish to take the easier way out that risks are still involved. The only way of being sure of avoiding this terrible disease is to practise monogomy or celibacy. It is difficult for everyone, but it can and should be done.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is not the major problem of an educational programme for drug misusers the fact that we are dealing mostly with youngsters aged between 16 and 24, who are enormously difficult to educate? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that much more is required above and beyond education?

Mr. Cormack: As the father of two children who are within or just approaching that age range, I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. That is why it is important, if a family subscribes to a faith, to say, "The tenets of our faith teach this," and to point out clearly and unequivocally that that is the case.

Dr. Godman: They live on their own.

Mr. Cormack: The hon. Gentleman points out that many of the youngsters about whom he is concerned live on their own and do not have parents to care for them. We all accept that, as we accept that the sort of people of whom the hon. Member for Torfaen gave such a graphic description are the most difficult to reach. However, because we accept and seek to grapple with that problem, a problem on which no money should be spared, as it should not be spared in trying to find a cure, it does not mean that we should forget that the vast range of the population, most of whom live what one would call a "normal life", are at risk. Everybody is at risk, and to most we can take a more orthodox approach.

I hope that my remarks will be conveyed to the Ministers with responsibility for this matter, and that there will be consultations with those who have a moral responsibility in the life of the nation.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): There have been moments in the debate when I have become aware of echoes of the past. While the moralising aspect is important and has to be mentioned, we should be much more concerned about trying to find a cure or prevention method for this awful disease, rather than exhorting people completely to change their way of life. It is a good thing to do in many instances, but that is looking at it from an extremely dangerous and long-term point of view, and we cannot wait that long. We cannot wait for several lifetimes before there is a cure or a vaccine.

I am reminded, from the dim and distant past, of when Paul Ehrlich, trying to find a cure for trypanolsomiasis, found something that produced an excellent effect on syphilis but was rather a dangerous drug, Salvarsan. It sometimes killed, but those who were not killed were cured of the disease. There was a terrible outcry against him or any doctor who wanted to use Salvarsan against syphilis, because one got syphilis only if one were promiscuous, and promiscuous people should not be saved. As a doctor, I did not adopt that attitude, although some might have done so. That seems to be one of the tendencies being indulged in today.

Sir Ian Percival rose——

Dr. Miller: I cannot give way, as I wish to get on with my speech.

The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), in an excellent speech, showed clearly what the problem is about. My hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) seemed at one point to be about to blame the profession for producing the disease. It reminded me of the General Practitioner of March this year, which talked about the problem and said:

"Part of the problem with AIDS is that it is a new disease first prescribed in 1981".

Of course it meant described. That was a Freudian slip. The article showed the nature of the disease and gave some statistics. It said:

"A few naive moments with a calculator working out exponentially doubling rates"— because it is estimated to double every six to eight months—showed that in the year 2000 the disease would affect about 4×10^{17} people—in other words, all of us. The article pointed out, however, that the calculation is fallacious, as the number and behaviour of susceptible people and risk groups will inevitably alter. I think that that is true.

The article described how AIDS started. In September 1981 there were 2,259 patients, of whom 917 had died. Of them, 71 per cent. were homosexual or bisexual, 17 per cent. were intravenous drug abusers, with equal numbers of males and females affected, 1 per cent. were haemophiliacs, 1 per cent. were sex partners of high risk groups, and 6 per cent. apparently had no risk factors, but by the end of 1984 there were almost 7,000 patients, with almost 4,000 deaths.

We know that the disease could well reach epidemic proportions. Hon. Members have been inundated with leaflets and booklets about the disease. The virus is about one sixteen thousandth the size of a pin head. It operates by using its ribonucleic acid. When it enters the bloodstream it makes straight for the "T" cells and converts its RNA into DNA, which is a double spiral instead of one. It then enters the chromosomes, which determine what the cell will do. The whole system is invaded by the virus.

Many hon. Members have made excellent speeches today. Incidentally, I still call it the human "T" cell lymphotropic virus type 3 the HTLV 3. I am glad that a special Cabinet Committee has been established, and that there is international co-operation with a team, but more money is needed, and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) that no money should be spared. This disease should be given at least as much priority as that accorded to the Falklands.

Some hon. Members have said that they are not sure about certain aspects of social communication and behaviour. For example, can the virus be carried in tears, kissing, shaking hands, and so on? The answer is probably not, but too little is known as yet. Hon. Members ask other telling questions. For example, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) asked how long it was before an antibody could be detected in the blood. It takes several months. There is also the question of the very toxic nature of the limited number of anti-AIDS drugs. Moreover, I completely agree with the strictures made of screening. It would be a hopeless course to embark upon.

I say, "For God's sake, do not allow extraneous considerations to cloud the main point." That point is that we must work for a vaccine and a cure for this awful disease. I have lived through the era when a search was being made for a safe cure for tuberculosis, syphilis, gonorrhoea and pneumonia. There are now safe cures for those conditions. There has also been a search for better treatment for diabetes, cancer and cardiovascular disease, and many dramatic improvements have been made.

I said earlier, by way of intervention, that we have a problem, the like of which we have not seen before—certainly during the era I am talking about, the past 50 or 60 years. There is a proliferation of drugs which sometimes cure and, in other instances, help. There has never been such a plethora of information as there is in this case. It took a long time to determine the casual organisms of many of the diseases that I have mentioned. This time, in a short period, the organism and the antibodies have been identified. Previously, it took years and years — generations—before that knowledge was available.

On a number of occasions I have spoken about my youngest son while attacking the Government for making it difficult to obtain posts in colleges and hospitals. I am pleased to tell the Minister that he is now the senior lecturer in biochemistry, molecular biology and recombinant DNA engineering at the Liverpool polytechnic. I hope that he will be one of those who work in this area and that, before it is too late, we will get a vaccine and a cure for this awful disease.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): I welcome my right hon. Friend's encouraging statement. We do not face just an epidemic in this country. The AIDS virus is now endemic in the United Kingdom. Rabies is not an epidemic in Europe but it is endemic there. The AIDS virus is endemic in Africa, and it has been for many years. The disease may be new, but the virus is not.

I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) say that there was hope in this ghastly business. He talked about the great strides that had been made in research. I add that there is hope in the research carried on in my home city of Glasgow, where Professor Jarrett has experimented on cat viruses. These experiments have been viewed with great interest in the United States. Cats suffer from immuno-deficiency, too. The virus has been isolated. We hope that the experiments will lead to some way of combating HIV. The HIV virus was graphically described to me by Dr. Madhok of the Glasgow royal infirmary as a pirate of the cells. I think that the hon. Member for East Kilbride will concur with that description.

I have watched Government action on this problem develop from a rather gracious walk to a fast trot. In 1985 I was grateful when they took swift action to ensure the cleansing of blood so that there could be no fear associated with having an operation, or of haemophiliacs being any more at risk.

The House has been asked to consider several measures. Mass screening would be a grave mistake. The consequences would raise the spectres which I believe the second world war was fought to prevent. However, there may be room for selective screening in high risk groups. In some professions and jobs, individuals are at risk and may cause risk to others. I include surgeons, dentists and food processors who may be homosexual. We must consider in the future some way in which people in those types of high-risk professions who are identified as having the disease are at least compensated if they have to withdraw from their jobs.

Screening of immigrants has been mentioned, but it would not be foolproof. We know how long it takes for the virus to incubate. Although we could encourage some high-risk groups to be screened, obviously we would have to make international bilateral arrangements. We must remember that, when we condemn those who might come out of Africa, in Canada AIDS is just as bad as it is in the United States.

Reference has been made to the McClelland report, a Scottish report. We have discussed the issuing of clean sharps to drug addicts. That has been done too late in Edinburgh. I believe deep in my heart that issuing sharps encourages drug taking. I would not be averse, however, to endorsing the idea of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) that we try an experiment in Glasgow and see whether it works. If one gives five sharps to a drug taker, he may go into a "shooting gallery", as it is euphemistically called, where there are seven people. At least two people will then use contaminated sharps, so that is not a foolproof method.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the new health and educational measures. I hope that Scotland will benefit from the financial help. There are other swift and realistic counter-measures which are more immediate. We can produce good posters and educational leaflets, and place good advertisements on radio and television. However, some examples must not be given too much prominence. In this debate, some of those examples have been given far too much prominence.

I mention in particular the Terrence Higgins Trust material. The trust may be expatiating some kind of guilt, but I believe that its view of life is distorted. I do not think that, on the whole, the hetrosexual community indulges in bizarre sexual practices the like of which are described in the trust's leaflets. I much prefer the approach of the Scottish AIDS monitoring group, which is much more realistic and reasonable. Scottish Television must be congratulated on being the first to move strongly in this campaign with advertising and education on television. We should consider the deep need for the IBA to alter its advertising policy. "Better to offend than dead" seem to be the watchwords of the day. From what I have heard from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival), the IBA seems to have double standards, which should be investigated.

We need a professional approach to advertising. If the Government can do it for Sid and British Gas, they can do it for AIDS. We must make better use of existing resources. We need to liberalise the STD clinics to make them more like walk-in centres, removing the stigma attached to them. The problem of ensuring confidentiality might rear its head, but counselling and free screening advice are the first line of defence. It might be slightly ridiculous to make this suggestion, but I believe that the Family Planning Association clinics should extend a welcome to homosexuals and give free condoms to them as well as to heterosexuals.

Mobile units, such as the blood transfusion service, which is already helping to educate people about the disease, may well develop their services with financial assistance. For example, they could use videos to educate the individuals who use their services. It may well be that the well-woman clinics and cervical screening clinics could be used, as well as the well-man clinic in Castlemilk in Glasgow, which must be mentioned as a new development. A total of 11,000 pharmaceutical outlets in this country have volunteered their resources. That must be taken up and assisted with funding. We must also emphasise to general practitioners that they must help to improve their services as well as helping to fund hospital care units.

In the final analysis, the Government cannot account for private behaviour. The first thing I would suggest is that we should all be honest with our partners and ourselves, especially if we are in high-risk categories. If we are in high-risk categories, we should abstain. If we go abroad on business, let us remember the Canadian poll on business men, taken quite recently, which asked business men who visited central Africa what they would do if confronted with prostitutes who had the virus. They said that it would not make any difference to their activities. That is something that we should be exceptionally careful of and warn our business community about its travels abroad. Of course we must encourage people to give up drugs, and, especially, we must encourage them not to start in the first place.

Alas, we now have to think of that rich, red, life-giving liquid blood in the same terms as we have thought of urine and faeces. We do not handle them, so we do not handle blood; or at least we should handle it as little as possible. I am thinking particularly of guidance that must be given to those who deal with youngsters in playgrounds at school, where it is inevitable that accidents will take place and lesions will occur. We have to think of future generations. Frankly, this problem is more immediate than anything that the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament can come up with.

There is still a great deal of ignorance about the disease, as the MORI poll in Scotland showed. However, at least we are getting through to people in Scotland, and 70 per cent. of those who were polled said that they felt that their families were in danger. At least they are alerted to the problem. A total of 85 per cent. of those polled said that they thought that advertising of condoms on television was fine.

The Scottish Television initiative of going to New York has been incredibly helpful in tracing the course of the disease. One person in 16 in New York now carries the virus, and we are only four years behind. The figures for Scotland are frightening, and they are changing for the worse from day to day. In the face of those statistics, the Government can do very little if we do not alter our behaviour. We will have to be sexually continent and responsible from now on or, for all of us, as the philosopher Hobbes once said in "Leviathan", life will be "nasty, brutish and short." Our leviathan is AIDS. I greet the Government's initiatives with a great deal of relief.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): After the intervention of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) earlier this morning, I was pleased with the speech she made. It was thoughtful, unlike the intervention, and I agree with a good deal of what she has told the House. Her opening sentence echoed the opening of the excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch). The Secretary of State, as the House and he know, is not my favourite Minister. Perhaps he shares that honour with the Paymaster General, but the Secretary of State is certainly not very high in the league table.

The start of the debate, with the speeches by the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), was fantastically good. I have attended practically every health debate for many years. They covered most of the material, and that gave the start to the nearest to a consensus debate that I have heard for a long time. Because so much has already been said, all that those who speak afterwards can do is to underline some of it.

I start with the fact that, in spite of the tremendous amount of public attention, we are still not seized of the enormity of the problem facing not just us but the whole of mankind. The clinical analogy with the bubonic plague, or with several other diseases, is not accurate, but, with the outbreak of the disease, the clock has gone back 300 years, to the possibility of a universal plague, because at present there is no cure. That is why the whole House is seeking desperately to find ways and means of dealing with the threat. Contract AIDS and inevitably one dies; that is one's death sentence.

Sometimes we make comparisons. This morning the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) talked about promiscuity, and I share his view. Of course, promiscuity is one of the basic elements that we have to deal with. I do not agree with much of the pontificating on moral attitudes, because the reality is moral behaviour and there is nothing that we can do by getting on our high horse and making statements about other people's behaviour.

There is no comparison with the other great killer, cancer. The House will have heard me say this many times. Viscount Tonypandy reminded me of it when he was ill. Cancer is a great killer, but more people recover from it than die from it. The House will have heard me say that I am one of the fortunate individuals who have recovered from it. Also, my wife's cancer was surgically removed 10 years ago. Mine was surgically removed six years ago. We both hope to emulate my late friend, Manny Shinwell, and to be around for many years more. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear".]

I was reminded by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South of another analogy. The mortality figures have been bandied about. Some 20 years ago I introduced the first Bill to put a warning on the side of cigarette packets. The Chief Medical Officer of Health, on behalf of the Government, now tells us that there are 50,000 premature deaths a year as a result of smoking cigarettes—from chronic emphysema, carcinoma and chronic bronchitis, and 40,000 deaths from heart disease. If people gave up cigarette smoking, those deaths would not occur. If one wants to bandy about comparisons, there is no doubt that we have not been able to change social habits in that one area—we are now trying to do so in another—and those social habits amount to one death every three minutes. But that does not help us, because it is not comparable. We are in an entirely new situation.

Most of the time we are talking about containment, treatment and research. All Governments pay tribute to primary care by general practitioners—the first line of defence, we say—but the general practitioners are the "poor bloody infantry". They are in the front line. Unless something is done, the assault that we have seen over the past two or three years will overwhelm them. Patients show anxiety and make inquiries and a decision must be made about whether to refer them to a genito-urinary clinic. The patient may demand tests, but no tests can be given without counselling. That takes time.

The point has been made in the debate that there is a desperate shortage of training for counsellors. There is no point in saying that we must have more counseliors unless we have the people trained to do the job. We shall return again and again to the problem of resources and here we are talking not only about the necessary money but about the people to use the resources effectively. Patients must be told the truth about the consequences. Who would like to be in the position of my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), who has to say to his patients, "I am sorry. There is no hope. You are going to die"?

It is not always understood that there is a basic difference between clinics for AIDS and clinics for syphilis. There is no treatment for AIDS and, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride said in his learned medical speech, we have known about Salvarsan for donkey's years—almost generations.

The final stage for AIDS is hospital. I agree with those hon. Members who have spoken about the importance of the Lighthouse project. It is desperately needed and should receive full support.

Perhaps I could make a plea for the borough of Brent. As hon. Members know, that is an excellent constituency near London. Because the Government are closing a second hospital in my area, there is an admirable place at the Neasden site for a hospice similar to the Lighthouse. I hope that the Minister, when he makes a decision about what is to happen to that site, will bear that in mind. Two beds were recently refurbished in the Central Middlesex hospital and there is a possibility of AIDS treatment there. The refurbished new ward would be ideal for dealing with the problem for the whole of north-west London.

Doctors are in the front line, but of course so are nurses, because they are always in the front line. I should like to pay tribute to the brief from the Royal College of Nursing about which hon. Members have already spoken and to quote what the oncology adviser to the Royal College of Nursing has said:

"In view of the fact that medicine has so little to offer to patients . . . at this present time, nursing is central to care and prolonged survival and we would wish to see a greater investment of resources in this area.

Nursing research at this present time in the United Kingdom is desperately underfunded and we would wish to see this situation remedied as we feel it has a great deal to offer in planning the future care for this population group."

That is, the people with AIDS.

The fact that patients are ambulant for a long time places two new demands on training and the need for adequate funding. First, community nurses must be given top-up training required for dealing with AIDS, and that must be in addition to their training in basic nursing skills and experience. Secondly, it is vital that training and information should be given to home helps. Because of the fear attached to this disease, unless home helps are fully informed and know all about what is happening there will be a crisis about the care of people still living in the community and in need of support.

I was interested to hear the report by the hon. Member for Canterbury, who serves on the Medical Research Council, on which I had the honour to serve some years ago. Inevitably, we have talked a lot about pharmacology, but insufficient thought has been given to microbiology, biophysics and biochemistry, because in some of those fields we may find the answers that we need. The Medical Research Council has suffered cuts which it did not deserve, and I find it difficult to understand why it still has to use its funds to give grants to the Public Health Laboratory Service for work on AIDS. Therefore, the transfer of funds from one place to another represents a cut.

There are four sources of funding: the Medical Research Council, the Wellcome Foundation, the pharmaceutical industry and private individuals. One individual has provided £108,000 for diagnostic equipment at St. Mary's hospital, to which reference has already been made in this debate. Funding is co-ordinated in America. We need a national body to monitor the raising and distribution of funds. Hospital front line clinical research should not have to be diverted to treatment and academics should be able to deal with this problem within their own field. However, I understand that academics are being converted to treatment because of the prevailing pressures.

Much has been said about the use of condoms, but insufficient has been said about advice regarding their use. People must be taught how to use them effectively. A condom can be used either correctly or incorrectly. If it is incorrectly used, it is ineffective. Furthermore, it does not provide the required security. It may be possible to persuade people to use condoms, but if they do not know how to use them correctly there will be a false dawn. The biggest nonsense is that the only free issue of condoms is by family planning clinics. I hope that the Minister will announce that a statutory instrument is to be introduced which will enable general practitioners to provide condoms on the National Health Service, in the same way as family doctors can provide both the pill and the diaphragm. We have the opportunity to remedy that anomaly.

I hope that the Department is discussing co-ordination with the Royal College of General Practitioners and the general medical services committee of the BMA. As has been said time and time again on both sides of the House, a combined operation involves co-operative effort.

A number of my hon. Friends have used the analogy of the Falklands war. This disease has resulted in an international, universal, cosmopolitan crisis which will be with us for the next 50 years. Something must be done about it now. We found £3 billion from the contingency fund at the drop of a hat for the Falklands war. I see that the Secretary of State has returned to the Treasury Bench. I am sorry that he was not here earlier; for the first time since his appointment I had a few kind words to say about him and he knows that that is very unusual. I hope that the Secretary of State or the Minister for Health will tell the House that the Prime Minister and the Government have said that the contingency fund will be bottomless. The greatest drawback to the effective conquering of this disease would be to make it just one more element in the distribution of National Health Service resources.

I welcomed the Secretary of State's announcement about the increased funds that are to be made available, but it is no use giving just this amount or just that amount. If the Secretary of State's policy is effective, it will have a snowball effect on research, treatment, care and, in particular, training. Those who are already qualified will need to attend a crash course to top up their training. In this case, the sky should be the limit.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I should like to help the House by calling those hon.

Members who have sat through the debate, particularly as it is a Friday. However, the Front Bench speakers hope to catch my eye not later than 2 o'clock. As seven hon. Members are trying to catch my eye—we can all do the arithmetic — speeches of more than six and a half minutes duration will prevent me from calling all of them.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): In the circumstances, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall try to take considerably less than six and a half minutes.

I welcome the return of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the Front Bench, as my comments will be directly related to the way in which he opened the debate. First, I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Government on the steps that they are taking to alert the public to the dangers of the sexual behaviour prevalent among the young and the dangers of promiscuity and homosexuality. I must, however, take issue with my right hon. Friend's statement that at this stage there is no risk in ordinary social contact. Although, fortunately, the disease has not yet reached the stage in this country that it has reached in the United States, Africa, Canada and many other countries in the world, context transmission of the disease cannot be limited to sexual contacts, drug addicts and blood transfusions.

In an affidavit to an inquiry in the United States in July this year Dr. John Seale said:

"Once a critical mass of people have been infected rapidly by a highly efficient means of transmitting the virus, then transmission by a far less efficient means will inevitably occur increasingly often. These include blood transfusions, perinatal transmission, biologically normal sexual intercourse, needle-stick industries, sharp contact of sores or abrasions with contaminated blood, saliva, or sputum, mechanical transmission by blood-sucking insects and flies, and routine dental procedures."

At present this country is suffering only the very beginnings of the disease, and although it is likely that we can contain the explosion of the virus among our population better than has been the case in the United States, because we have had that example to avoid and more time to prepare ourselves, it would be over-optimistic to believe that the guidelines currently laid down by the Government and the public relations exercise on which we are embarking will do more than delay the time when the full force of this appalling disease falls upon our community.

One of the difficulties of public education is that those attempting to educate the public have only a very limited knowledge of the dangers. I shall, therefore, briefly run through a few facts which have been established and which point to the full danger that we now face.

First, over a period of five years it is estimated that between 25 and 30 per cent. of known carriers of the disease will die. We have known about the disease itself for only six years and it is mathematically probable — as well as, I am advised, medically probable — that the number of carrier deaths will continue to rise inexorably in the next six years. The chances are that between 60 and 70 per cent. of carriers will die of the disease less than 10 years after acquiring the virus, and no one can say whether any or all of the remainder will survive much longer. Given that we have known about the disease for only six years and that the number of carriers in the United States is estimated at best at 1·5 million and at worst at more than 4 million, the full horror facing the human race, and not just sections of it, is apparent.

Secondly, all body fluids are known to hold and carry the AIDS virus — not just blood and semen, but tears and saliva. That clearly constitutes a grave danger, as people carrying the disease may be infectious for up to 20 years and will be in daily contact with the rest of the population.

Thirdly, in the world context AIDS is not primarily a sexually transmitted disease. It is a blood-transmitted disease of the same retro-virus group as three well-known animal diseases — maedi-visna in sheep, bovine leukaemia in cattle and equine anaemia in horses—all of which are highly infectious, and all of which can be carried by insects as well as subject to blood transmission by other means. I see no reason, and no medical expert has yet given any, to assume that the AIDS virus will be transmitted in any way other than the way in which those known related viruses are transmitted.

As for Africa, I take issue with what my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) said. She maintained that it has been endemic in Africa for many years. My understanding is that medical evidence suggests that the first known case of AIDS in human beings occurred in 1978.

Mrs. McCurley: The disease, not the virus.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I do not believe that there is any evidence of the virus before 1978, but we can argue about that another time.

The rate of expansion in Africa is horrifying. It reads like a science fiction novel for those of us who face the terrific horror of the reality, which is that about 80 per cent. of the population in central Africa are likely to be condemned to die from the disease, that at least 30 per cent. already carry it and that 20 per cent. of the carriers are children under 16. That is the crucial point which I mentioned earlier—it is now being carried extensively by children. It is transmitted not only by sexual intercourse —I submit that it is transmitted not primarily by sexual intercourse—but also by blood.

It follows from the facts that I have outlined that we must look much wider than public relations and persuading people to alter their sexual habits if we are to contain the disease for long enough to find a vaccine or a cure.

We must consider spending far more on research. We should consider building special hospital facilities and training special medical staff to look after AIDS cases. We should consider how we can contain the entry of AIDS-bearing visitors to Britain and identify the risks.

What almost everybody who has spoken has said about rejecting mass screening is wrong. Perhaps we are at too early a stage to have mass screening, but it would be criminally irresponsible if the Government failed to take such steps if the disease reached the level that is to be found in the United States.

We must be ready to have screening of the entire population, because AIDS carriers will be highly infectious and will be giving their disease to others in normal daily contact. Although we need to know who is carrying the disease, it is vital that we maintain ordinary contact with them and that they are not isolated or separated from the community. Nevertheless, it must be known whether people who are involved in a car crash and are bleeding, for example, are a danger to health. It is not fair to ask the police and ambulance services to come into contact with an accident victim who is covered in blood without knowing what safety measures they should take to avoid the risk of dying from AIDS themselves.

1.23 pm.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am sure that the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) understands that time does not allow me to respond to some of the interesting points that he made.

I welcome the fact that we are having this important debate in the first full week of the new Session. Like other right hon. and hon. Members, I welcomed the Secretary of State's speech, and I welcome the fact that he has taken the trouble to spend quite a bit of time listening to the debate.

As a number of hon. Members have acknowledged, we face a tragic situation in Edinburgh. The proportion of our population carrying the AIDS virus is higher than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. More than half the AIDS babies born in the United Kingdom are from Edinburgh. A total of 22 babies in the city have been born with AIDS.

It is well understood why Edinburgh has reached this position. It is accepted that the virus started among our injecting drug misuser — IDM — population in about 1983 and about 50 per cent. of that population are now HIV carriers.

The reason for Edinburgh's unique situation — it is different from the position in London, where the virus is found predominantly in the homosexual population — is that we have a substantial drug abuse problem and a high proportion of our drug misusers inject heroin. There is a pattern of sharing needles; reference has been made to the "shooting galleries" where the first user mixes heroin with his blood and passes the needle around, thereby ensuring that most of the other addicts will become carriers of the virus.

We have only 15 AIDS cases in Scotland, and nine of them are in the Lothian region. However, Edinburgh is on the brink of an outbreak of indigenous AIDS cases. So far, most cases have come in from outside the city. It is expected that we could have up to 100 cases in the first year, and we are probably approaching the end of the lull before the storm.

It is important to recognise that Edinburgh needs special help. Much has been said about the need for education. That is obviously crucial and it is the most important requirement, but the lack of time prevents me from examining that issue in detail.

I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) paid tribute to the Scottish Television material. If the Secretary of State and his colleagues have not seen the leaflet prepared by STV — about 100,000 copies are to be distributed to young people of 16 and over in Scotland — I commend it to them, because STV has done much useful work and that sort of leaflet could be most helpful.

I wish to concentrate on the need for more intensive action among the high-risk groups. I leave aside the homosexual community, because in Scotland we must concentrate on our injecting drug misuser population. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) said that we have about 10,000 IDMs in Scotland, including 3,000 in the east of Scotland, 50 per cent. of whom are carrying the virus. The comparative figure in the west of Scotland is only 5 per cent. and it is crucial to recognise that there are many more drug misusers in west central Scotland, so we could be on the verge of a terrifying explosion in the transmission of the AIDS virus in the Glasgow area.

That is why I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State said that the Government would respond very soon to the important recommendations of the McClelland committee — the Government have had the report now since September. I hope that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will reconsider his suggestion that there might be a pilot project in Glasgow. The McClelland report is a cautious document and it considers the issues very carefully. We must balance the enormous risk to the human population from AIDS against the tragic incidence of drug abuse.

In his response to my intervention, the Secretary of State acknowledged that the McClelland report mentions control through general practitioners and the exchange of existing syringes and needles for new ones. The recommendations include advice and how a valid, counselling relationship should exist between the GP and the individual drug user.

Although no evidence is available in the United Kingdom on that point, there have been useful experiences in Amsterdam and southern Italy, and the case is overwhelming for biting the bullet and implementing the recommendations of the McClelland committee. It is impossible to sustain the argument that such action should be taken in Glasgow but not in Edinburgh. There is the whole question of the movement of the virus from drug misusers into the general population. The drug-misusing population is changing all the time, with new people joining it and others leaving.

Mr. Kirkwood: I should like to take two seconds to explain that I was looking at the point from the Government's position. They are under pressure, but I entirely support the point made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) that action should be taken universally. If the Government are under pressure, they should at least consider setting up the initial pilot project.

Mr. Strang: I am glad that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman and that he has had the opportunity to clarify his position.

The other group to which I must refer is prostitutes. The reality is that the drug misuser must find the money to meet his habit. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West referred to prescriptions and attempts to wean drug misusers from drugs to substitutes. We must take that point seriously in the AIDS context.

A significant number of people — especially, but not only, females — obtain money for drugs from prostitution. Many people from Scotland will have seen the interview with an Edinburgh prostitute. She was an HIV carrier, and she said that she had had about 37 partners that week and there was no question of their taking the basic precautions. We must consider prostitutes very carefully. Just as I hope that the Government will respond positively to the McClelland report for Scotland in relation to the exchange of syringes and needles, so I hope that they will consider prostitutes. This calls for much counselling and work, and people will have to make contact with prostitutes and perhaps provide spermicidal sponges and condoms through GPs. That is a suggestion that must be considered.

It is very important to reduce the rate of spread of AIDS. That is the crucial point. In New York, the doubling time reached six months at one stage. It is now estimated to be around 11 months here. If there is a six-month doubling time and there are 1,000 carriers, in five years there will be 500,000 carriers. However, with a 12-month doubling time there will be 16,000 carriers. There is a great difference between 16,000 and 500,000 carriers over a five-year period. The Government must extend the doubling time and, as quickly as possible, reach a point where the incidence no longer doubles and the number of carriers begins to decline.

I was encouraged by the Secretary of State's remarks about screening. He hit the nail on the head when he said that we must consider the purpose of screening. For the high-risk groups, the advice is the same whether or not someone has the virus. In this context, we should make it easier for those who wish to be screened to be screened. We should encourage those who are about to get married, or who are thinking of having a baby, to be screened, because many people would choose not to have a baby if they discovered that they had AIDS. That would be the right course, because there is a 50 per cent. chance of the baby contracting the disease if the mother is an HIV carrier. We should encourage people to be screened on a voluntary basis, but let us not assume that if someone discovers that he is a carrier it will lead him to behave more responsibly. Some people may behave irresponsibly after discovering that they are carriers.

I must return to the question of resources. Hon. Members have said that London is a special case. It is, but in a debate in the Scottish Grand Committee in July I asked for an additional £1 million for Lothian because it knows that it will have additional costly cases and that there will be many more in the future. We are in the front line of the disease in the context of drug misusers, and that is why we must obtain additional resources.

I hope that we can draw a veil over the remarks in The Scotsman on 3 September of the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), who used to be the Minister responsible for health in Scotland. He made remarks such as, "The Government do not believe that there is any public demand for extra resources". He said that he was opposed to the exchange of needles and that in Edinburgh the problem would have to be treated as only one of the problems of the Health Service.

I have no intention of turning this into a party political issue, but if it is not to become a party political issue we must get additional resources on the scale which the public regard as appropriate. That means additional money for research, counselling and all the work that can be done before people contract the disease. I hope that the Government will respond quickly and positively to the McClelland recommendations, which are well considered, and that we can obtain the additional net resources which the Health Service in Scotland, and especially in Lothian, urgently requires.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): May I begin by making two declarations of interest, of both of which I am proud. First, I am a patron of Turning Point, which is the only national voluntary organisation that provides rehabilitation, counselling and care for people with alcohol and drug-related problems, and increasingly with AIDS problems. Secondly, my constituency houses the Centre for Applied Microbiology Research, which is an arm of the Public Health Laboratory Service at Porton.

The Public Health Laboratory Service was set up all those years ago precisely to cope with crises such as AIDS. It has a statutory duty to work to control infectious and communicable diseases. AIDS work is now its highest priority, but how is it faring? The Public Health Laboratory Service is co-ordinated from Colindale, where a team of epidemiologists and statisticians works in the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre and produces a weekly communicable disease report. The Central Public Health Laboratory evaluates blood testing technology. Its virologists have proved that the British blood testing kits produced by Wellcome are the best.

The Centre for Applied Microbiology Research in my constituency is responsible for the manufacture of inactivated AIDS virus. AIDS virus is a delicate organism, and thank goodness we have the equipment and the staff to manage the operation safely. But work is also done there on evaluating differences between AIDS virus strains in different parts of the world. In addition, the PHLS has about 50 local laboratories, including one at Odstock hospital in Salisbury.

I have to say that morale has been seriously affected by the PHLS accountability review which was heard at the DHSS on 3 November. It makes no sense to close PHLS laboratories or to transfer them to the district health authorities by a financial sleight of hand. We need those laboratories and staff to stay as an integrated service for the whole nation, and I exhort my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to note that.

The PHLS needs expanding, not contracting. It is desperately short of laboratory space. For instance, it cannot contribute effectively to international co-operation because it does not have enough laboratory space so it cannot take in and train either students or experts from countries that are facing truly terrible AIDS problems. The PHLS has AIDS as its first priority, but in so doing it has had to reorder its priorities and slow down other work on other subjects. To what extent is that acceptable?

CAMR has the unique opportunity to maintain its world lead. I pay tribute to the fact that, two years ago, the Government had the foresight to enter into a unique agreement with Porton International plc, the leading British biotechnology company, to cover the marketing and distribution of all products and processes of CAMR. This firm is the most fully, vertically and horizontally, integrated of all firms in AIDS diagnostics and treatment. It has achieved a great deal, is the leading company in the world, and also does leading work to help those suffering from haemophilia.

It is unfortunate that some headlines in the newspapers —I stress headlines—have been needlessly alarming. The report in The Times on 3 November had the headline:

"British tests on AIDS drug offer hope for cure".

That was completly misleading. Had it said, "Hope for control" it would have been accurate, but that raised false hopes. I hope that we can get over to the media the message about the importance of getting these details, small as they are to a headline writer, absolutely correct.

Because PHLS and CAMR are world leaders, the Government have an international responsibility on

[Mr. Robert Key]

AIDS, and I urge them to greater enthusiasm. My hon. Friend the Minister for Health announced yesterday that the Government have pledged £250,000 to the World Health Organisation AIDS programme. That is a modest sum. I hope that it is not just conscience money and that the Government will not think that they need do no more. There are at least two reasons why they must do more.

The Government were represented at the recent AIDS conference in the Congo. It is now clear that, in the central African belt of countries, between 15 and 30 per cent. of people are infected and more people are dying of AIDS than are dying of hunger. Some of those countries will not even admit that they have AIDS, officially at least, although their doctors know exactly what is happening. The WHO cannot cope in these circumstances. It is simply not equipped to cope and we cannot expect it to.

Secondly, many of these African countries still look to Britain, often unofficially because of the problems, for help. The Government should urgently review our overseas aid programme and, as a practical and essential international contribution, should immediately establish bilateral programmes with countries requesting our help. We can offer two particular benefits. The first is blood screening and transfusion technology. Most of these countries do not have a national blood transfusion service and rely on the friends and relatives of the patients, or even someone who happens to be walking down the street. AIDS is spread quickly through the hospitals in such circumstances. Secondly, we can help with health education programmes with specific advice from the considerable experience of the Overseas Development Administration staff on the production of printed material, radio programmes, videos and so on. We have made a good start this week with Uganda, whose President was here.

Finally, every hon. Member has the responsibility to encourage health education in the community. We have to break through the barrier that says that if one tells young people about drugs, smoking, alcohol or AIDS they will be tempted to try it, to experiment and to succumb. As a former teacher, and having studied substance abuse in California, I am convinced that that attitude is not right. Likewise, we must come to terms with the need to exchange new needles for old for drug addicts.

In particular, we must encourage our district health authorities to take positive action, as mine is, I am glad to say. The district medical officer of health will shortly invite representatives from all organisations throughout the community and all local authorities and institutes, including the church, and a psychologist, and will establish a community control policy on AIDS.

We must face and achieve the hardest task of all, which is to change the attitudes of communities, nations, and indeed the world. The only approach that will work is one that is international and fully integrated. It must involve charities, Governments and pharmaceutical industries throughout the world.

Finally, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on what he said. It is only the start, but he will certainly have my enthusiastic support as his strategy develops.

1.45 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Today we have heard some overlong speeches, but I shall follow the exemplary lead given by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). Several Scottish Members have rightly pointed to the magnitude of the problem in Scotland. We need more research and an expansion in laboratory facilities. Moreover, Scotland has an inadequate pathology service, which must be improved. I do not know what the situation is like south of the border, but in Scotland we have difficulties with post-mortem examinations.

Perhaps more important, we must improve in-patient facilities in Scottish hospitals. My hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), who is a general practitioner, may correct me, but I think that there is only one hospital in Scotland which is adequately geared up to dealing with the problem, and that is Ruchill hospital in Glasgow. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride suggested, we are dealing with an extraordinary disease and doctors are largely working in the dark.

The problem is pre-ordained. Unless there are dramatic developments in therapeutic facilities and treatments, this social problem will worsen. Even now it haunts many families in Scotland. The virus is spreading among those who misuse drugs in Glasgow and in the west of Scotland. Regrettably, there has been an astounding increase in its spread between 1983 and 1985. Most of those at risk from misusing drugs are aged between 16 and 24. We need a major campaign to persuade those young drug misusers that, if they do not stop experimenting with drugs, they must at least reduce the risk. We know that drug misusers change their habits because of the threat of AIDS, but the problem is, as I have said before, that we are attempting to educate a group who are difficult to educate.

There are at least 7,000 drug misusers in the west of Scotland, although some would claim that the figure is as high as 12,000. We do not know the level of infection in Glasgow and in the rest of Strathclyde. However, we know that in Scotland AIDS is not an infection that is experienced predominantly by homosexual males, as those most at risk are young, sexually active heterosexuals. Therefore, we need an injection of money and professionals into preventive measures. As others have argued, we must declare war on this social problem.

Those Old Testament prophets who constantly moralise from pulpits and political platforms may well have to accept an educational programme which they would normally condemn out of hand. For many young drug misusers things will get much worse. Indeed, for some drug misusers the hour is regrettably very late in terms of diagnosis and prognosis.

Do the Government have any plans to institute training courses for social workers and other non-medical professionals involved in the counselling of AIDS victims and their families? Some hon. Members have suggested that it is always the doctor who is in the front line. In counselling matters, it is often a social worker from an area team or from a psychiatric hospital who is in the front line. A much wider question should be asked: why do young people misuse drugs? One reason is that their lives are characterised by hopelessness. Many of them are unemployed. They live in large, ugly, peripheral council schemes with little or nothing to look forward to. For these youngsters, using drugs can be an exciting, stimulating activity in forlorn, barren lives.

We must tackle these broad problems as a Government, as Her Majesty's Opposition and as a Parliament. If we tackle these major problems, drug misuse in my part of Scotland will decline. I, too, recommend the McClelland report to the Government, particularly the section that spells out the objectives of a campaign to prevent the spread of HIV. It is an excellent report, and the Government, in fairness and honesty, should take it on board.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): For the various reasons that have been put forward, I agree with the arguments against compulsory screening. I shall make two suggestions. First, there should be a legal requirement that those who are diagnosed as suffering from AIDS should be required to give information about their contacts. Secondly — it is not a small point — convicted rapists should be tested, in the interests not only of their victims but of society. If they are to be let loose on society again, their condition should be known.

Two suggestions that have been put forward are that free, clean needles should be provided for drug addicts, and free condoms for homosexuals. There are moral objections to both suggestions. I am bound to say to the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) that this is a moral issue. There are moral implications in what we are discussing. A case can be made for giving needles to drug addicts. It is part of the treatment for somebody suffering from a complaint of which he hopes to be cured. Homosexuality is different. It is not a complaint or a disease; it is an inclination or orientation.

Some people consider that homosexual practices are morally wrong. The Pope has made his view perfectly clear. Last week, 41 outspoken Roman Catholic bishops specifically ruled out sexual relations between homosexuals. They said:

"People must cut out sexual permissiveness and promiscuity if the epidemic is to be contained."

We might have hoped that we would hear something from the leaders of the Anglican Church before now. All credit to the Archbishop of York for his interview yesterday, and to the Bishop of Birmingham for his remarks in another place in a debate earlier this week.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sims: No, I am sorry.

In another place, the Bishop of Birmingham commented:

"The church has perhaps been too reticent in recent years about shouting loud for chastity."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1986; Vol. 482, c. 158.]

He can say that again. In the course of recent remarks, Cardinal Hume said:

"I think we have a lot of very hard thinking to do as a society, even if we have no religion."

I am sure that that is so.

It is said that within our population approximately 10 per cent. are homosexuals. I do not know how accurate that figure is. It does not mean that they have to indulge in homosexual practices, any more than the other 90 per cent. of us are obliged to indulge in heterosexual practices. There is, after all, such a thing as self-control. The problem is, of course, that the climate nowadays is not conducive to self-control. We cannot know exactly how much sexual activity takes place between males. I suspect that it is far greater now than it used to be.

It is one thing to recognise and counsel those who find that their sexual feelings are different and to try to help them and another to encourage them to indulge in homosexual practices. One aspect of that was highlighted by the Archbishop of York in his interview in the Daily Mail, which was reported today. He was reported as saying that he "firmly believed that young children's minds could be harmed by books which now present homosexuality as a viable alternative to heterosexual behaviour."

He went on to say:

"At the school stage, it is extremely difficult for young people to be clear about their sexual orientation and this is probably not even fixed until young adulthood."

Referring to some of the books used in schools—the so-called "gay studies"—he said:

"to have this too high on the agenda probably could lead many young people towards homosexuality who otherwise might have developed in a perfectly normal heterosexual fashion."

He commented:

"While . . . homosexuals as a group should not feel themselves beleaguered, threatened and shunned by society, I do not think it is wise to go to the opposite extreme and actually promote this as an entirely acceptable alternative lifestyle."

I suspect that many of my hon. Friends would say "Hear, hear" to that.

I suggest that there is a great responsibility on some people in show business who flaunt their homosexuality and other figures in public life who claim that they are proud to be "gay". They have corrupted what was once a fine English word. How many young people have been influenced by them — by clergymen who take an equivocal view, by local authorities which identify homosexuals as a special group, by the mayor of a London borough who advertises his homosexuality and has a male consort and even, alas, by Members of Parliament who publicise their inclinations? The media have played too large a part with specific programmes, such as those already mentioned, articles in newspapers and specific periodicals aimed at encouraging certain young people to "come out", as they say.

It has all gone much too far. It is time that the trend was reversed. There is a strong case for that reversal on religious and moral grounds, but, in the light of this debate, the public health grounds are overwhelming. If not only the Government but society as a whole fail to recognise that, they will do so at their peril.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): It would be idle to pretend that our country's response to the onset of AIDS has been prompt, rational or effective. To be fair to the Government, the whole developed world has had great difficulty in making the mental and other adjustments that have been needed to face up to an infectious disease which can kill and for which there is no known vaccine or cure.

Although most of us recognise that such scourges may wreak havoc in the Third world, we have believed until now that our prosperity and medical technology protected us here. This mental unpreparedness has been compounded by the fact that AIDS is a sexually transmitted disease. It has led to all sorts of hang-ups and an unwillingness by some even to treat it as an illness, preferring instead to see it as a punishment visited on a society in moral decline. God knows how they explain why we deserve to get cancer or influenza. The position was made even worse by the fact that the first references in this country were to its appearing in the gay community and by the hysterical response of the cheap Tory tabloid press to that fact.

It is against that background that we need to look at the Government's performance. They have tried of late to respond rationally, but, until recently, Ministers have not been prepared to speak out authoritatively to counter the lying hysteria of some of the newspapers on which they depend for political support. They have tried to respond to the demands of patients and doctors, but without providing the additional funds as promptly or as generously as the situation clearly required.

The majority of AIDS sufferers in England have gone for counselling and treatment to just three hospitals—St. Mary's, St. Stephens and the Middlesex, all in London, one of them within the health authority area that serves my constituency. The three health authorities involved are desperately short of funds. They have all seen real cuts in their resources at the same time as they have been asked to make contributions to help people suffering from AIDS. Those authorities still need more funds.

In August last year I urged the Prime Minister to provide more resources for the central London health authorities, which face the bulk of the burden. Some additional funds have been provided, but, as I have said, they all still face further reductions in their funding. People served by those hospitals do not think that it is right that their cancer services or services for people with broken legs should be reduced to make up for the funding which is not coming from the Government towards doing something about AIDS.

The general restraints on Department of Health and Social Security expenditure have had all sorts of effects. In Bloomsbury there was a need to appoint another senior registrar for work on AIDS. That was encouraged by one part of the DHSS, only to be obstructed by the manpower objectives laid down by another part of the same Department.

The clinic at the Middlesex hospital faces shortages of staff and an uncertain future. The new ward at the Middlesex for AIDS patients cost more than was originally estimated. The clinic costs a lot to run. For example, the need for special sterilisation measures requires duplicates and triplicates of equipment which wear out more quickly in any case because of the rigours of the sterilisation process.

The funding has not reflected all those things. The heat treatment of blood to kill the virus has imposed additional cost on the National Blood Transfusion Service. There have been other false economies within the National Health Service. Of all the ludicrous changes, the present plan to contract the network of public health laboratories outside London is most absurd as we face the spread of the disease and an increased need for diagnostic services and monitoring.

The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) referred to the plain, point-blank refusal of the previous Secretary of State for Education and Science to provide the extra funds which the MRC wanted for additional research on AIDS. Mention has been made by many hon. Members of haemophiliacs who have been infected with HIV from contaminated supplies of Factor VIII bought from the United States. The chilling aspect of the infection of these 1,200 of our fellow citizens is that they placed themselves in the hands of the NHS to be helped, not to be hurt. Just think of the position of young, married haemophiliacs. There can be no moral objection to anything that they have done. They thought that they were receiving help from the NHS and, instead, their system was being poisoned. That is what happened. It would not have happened if the blood products laboratory at Elstree had been brought on stream in good time and we had not had to buy infected Factor VIII from the United States.

Subsequently, heat-treated Factor VIII has been obtained and supplied to haemophiliacs, but the additional cost of that has not been reimbursed in full by the Government, with the result that some of the 10 reference centres for haemophiliacs throughout the country have had to find enormous amounts of money from their own health authority to pay for it. St. Thomas' hospital, which is one of the two regional centres in London, will be faced with a bill next year approaching £1 million to pay for the additional cost of services for haemophiliacs arising from the onset of AIDS. That authority is having its funds cut next year, not extended.

A further example—of the Government's ham-fisted response to the problem of AIDS—I do not blame Ministers present today—was the raid carried out by Customs and Excise on the Gay's the Word bookshop in my constituency. Some of the books seized were the very ones which first spelt out the dangers of AIDS and the measures which could be taken to reduce the possibility of its spreading. The books even included the proceedings of a New York medical symposium on AIDS, and another which described the very plan for safer sex which Ministers will now commend to the British public. They were not obscene then, and they are not obscene now. They should not have been seized. For a long time the raid stemmed the flow of information which literally meant life or death to some members of the gay community.

I am not criticising the Government just for what happened in the past. There is a lack of resources now, and the uncertainties stretch into the future. For the past week or so the Secretary of State has been calling for national unity on the issue. If we are to be united with the Government, they must remember that they are part of the nation, and they must make a major contribution to resolving the problem.

Confidence that adequate provision will be made in future was not assisted by the incapacity of the DHSS recently to supply prompt answers to one page of questions from me. I asked the Secretary of State simple questions such as:

"what is his estimate of the likely extent of acquired immune deficiency syndrome over the next five years . . . which health authorities are providing resources for the treatment or study of acquired immune deficiency syndrome". — [Official Report, 17 November 1986; Vol. 105, c 78.]

If Ministers cannot answer simple questions such as those, and if they do not have such basic facts, plans for effective action cannot be made, and still less can they be implemented.

What is needed? First, we must provide for people who are suffering from AIDS. We need adequate resources for counselling and diagnosis. We also need to provide for them to be treated for the opportunistic infections which strike people affected by HIV. Hospitals at present scarcely have the out-patient or in-patient space to deal with people with AIDS. Even worse is the provision for home care for those not sick enough to need a hospital bed. In parallel with that must go a massive research effort into improved methods of treating AIDS sufferers, directed as much at the opportunistic afflictions as at the AIDS virus. Some of the opportunistic diseases which do the killing are themselves viruses against which vaccines may be developed, and equally research must go into the psycho-social aspects of the disease to improve the quality of counselling.

Next, we must try to stop the disease spreading. At present most people affected are still members of the gay community, but it is spreading among heterosexuals. Gay men have as much right to protection against the disease as anyone else, and they are most at risk. We must continue to provide counselling and screening for those who seek it. Nothing should be allowed to deter those who wish to know whether they have the disease.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I do not have time. I am sorry.

Some insurance companies and money lenders have been reported as discriminating against people who have been tested for HIV even where that has proved negative. The Government should immediately change the law to stop that practice, which must be contrary to public policy.

Should there be compulsory screening of particular groups or of everyone? The answer is plainly no. It would consume vast resources and serve no useful purpose whatever in the circumstances. However, we cannot rule out universal screening if circumstances change. If a vaccine were developed which could prevent HIV but which would be harmful to people who already had it, it would be necessary to run a screening programme before a vaccination programme could be put into force.

Should people with AIDS be segregated? Frankly, the idea is quite ludicrous. Where would we segregate people for life? How would we find a place in which to segregate them, even if it was a sound idea? The idea is barmy.

Should people be discriminated against in employment? No, they should not. If a person is a work mate, he is no threat at all. If he is a sexual partner, he may become so. People should be treated for what they are—colleagues at work—and there should be no discrimination against them.

There is one bit of screening which I support. Semen can carry HIV. Therefore, it would be best to screen anyone who volunteered to donate semen for artificial insemination by donor. That would not be an invasion of liberty, because if a person did not want to be screened he need not volunteer for the service.

A number of hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, have spoken about the problems of intravenous drug users and the threat that they pose, especially in Scotland. I should like to reiterate what my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said. The McClelland committee recommendations should be implemented. To some extent, that may be a recognition and a legitimising of drug use, but on balance it is the lesser of two evils.

How do we try to stop the spread of this disease? The simple answer is less and safer sex, but that is easier said than done. The sexual drive is one of the strongest urges felt by humankind, at times even overcoming the drive to stay alive. Throughout history men and women have risked life and limb, fame and fortune, family and career for someone they loved or even merely fancied. We should not minimise the problems that face anyone seeking to abate or even change the course of sexual activity.

Among gay men, AIDS and the deaths from it have led to some modification of sexual habits, but not all gay men have modified their habits even though they are acutely aware of the dangers. Among heterosexuals there is still nothing like the same awareness of the threat. That is partly because of the early presentation by The Sun and other newspapers of AIDS as a gay plague. The people responsible for that sort of reporting must bear a great deal of the blame for helping heterosexuals to believe that AIDS was no threat to them.

We must try as much as we can to develop awareness in the young if we are to convince them that less and safer sex is to be their lot. The process will be helped if older people, including aging 46-year-olds like me, choose to remember what we did when we were young, with whom we did it and how keen we were on it. People with honest memories are more likely to be listened to by young people than those who, reversing Shakespeare, forget with advantages what deeds they did those days. Impossible demands will get no response and simple-minded suggestions that we should say to young people, "Do not" will only evoke the response, "Do not be bloody silly." That is an appropriate response.

Some pessimists fear that heterosexuals will not take much notice until a lot more of them die, and if we are realistic we must recognise that there is something in that fear. We support the Government's efforts to get people to reduce the number of their sexual partners, but the Government will need to employ better advertising than that which they indulged in before and which had such little impact. In the new campaign they will need to spend large sums of money, comparable with the amount that is being spent on persuading people to buy shares in British Gas. Up to now the Government have attached more importance to Sid buying shares than to Sid avoiding AIDS, and we must change the priorities.

In advance of the advertising campaign, additional facilities must be provided in hospitals and in sexually transmitted disease clinics, because advertising is bound to bring about an increase in the number of people going to such places for advice. It would be foolish to get things out of sequence, and we need additional resources before we go in for the publicity. In carrying out the publicity we must avoid being mealy-mouthed. No sooner does someone mention sex in public than people start using words with Latin roots or words taken straight from the French. As a result it is not clear to everyone what they are talking about.

If we are to get the message over to everybody, are the words barrier contraceptive, condom or even sheath plain enough? I think not. We must use in public the words that are used in private and which everybody understands. It would be a good start to stop using the word condom and to use words like Durex or rubber Johnny instead. Those are the words that people use when they are talking in private. We must find slogans that are direct and that make an impact.

"If you can't be good, be careful" is a bit of an old stager, but we must direct all our advertising and efforts at young people to restrain them from doing what they naturally wish to do. Another slogan might be:

"If you must have it off, put one on".

Perhaps the copywriters will take that up; perhaps they will not. We must be serious about this. It is the only way to get the message over. A lot of French words will not do it for us.

Finally, I join those hon. Members who have said that we cannot deal with this problem in terms of Britain alone. It is a major global problem, and it will be solved only on a global scale. The Governments of all countries must batter the research-based drugs industries into adopting a fully collaborative research programme, with nobody holding back for the sake of cheap, short-term financial advantage.

The future of vast numbers of people throughout the world is at stake. We must ensure that our Government make a sensible and prompt contribution by providing funds to combat the disease here. They have not done so up to now. The Government must also provide vastly more funds and expertise so that our response to the horrible thing that is happening in Africa is not the squalid, petty-minded response of screening those people before they come here, but the proper, decent, charitable response of doing whatever we can to help those people in their desperate circumstances. As one of the world's developed countries, that is our obligation and it must be discharged.

2.16 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): At the outset of the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) I had a small fear that he would disturb the tone of the debate, but by the end of his speech I am happy to say that not only had I been considerably entertained but I found myself in considerable agreement with some of the messages that he was seeking to give us, although I would not have clothed them in precisely the same language.

Mr. Dobson: That is the trouble!

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. Of course we all accept that it is necessary to use the terms that are required in order to communicate, although I suspect that one of the difficulties is that different groups of people use entirely different terminology. One of the serious points that the hon. Gentleman made will be reflected in the campaign that we are about to launch: the need to seek to address young people—one of the groups most at risk—in terms that are related to their attitudes. We must not assume that they have the attitudes that perhaps we adopted 20 or 30 years ago—still less the attitudes and views that we hold now.

For that very reason, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services made clear earlier today, and as will have been made very clear to those members of the media who were at the launch of the Government's campaign material, the campaign will not be conducted simply through the general media, in the hope that some young people will read the national newspapers or watch the national television services. Part of the campaign will be specifically directed at young people through the magazines that young people read and through the media, including the radio and cinema which are particularly powerful media for young people. Whatever differences of opinion there may be between hon. Members about the precise terms in which we should address both young and older people—

Mr. Cash: What about the schools?

Mr. Newton: Yes, and in the schools. Whatever differences of opinion there may be, I hope that there will be agreement that we must address young people directly in terms tailored to their attitudes and needs and in ways which enable us to communicate effectively with them. That is one of the clearest messages that has come out of today's debate and I welcome it very much.

The debate has been constructive and important and I make no apology for not being able to add to the decisions announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when he opened the debate. I cannot say that we have suddenly reached a conclusion about needles, free condoms or the many other issues that have arisen in the debate. Indeed, the House would be entitled not to take me seriously if I suggested that we had. As the debate clearly showed, not least in the impressive speeches from Scotland, these are difficult matters requiring careful consideration, but they are also urgent and they are now being addressed by the Government. The views expressed in the debate, often in extremely impressive terms, can now be taken into account by the Government in the decision making process. Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I give a clear undertaking that what has been said today will be genuinely taken into account in the continuing work of the Government.

At the outset, lest it be squeezed out due to the brevity of my speech, I should pick up something said by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) in his impressive opening speech for the Opposition. This was echoed by a number of hon. Members and it was repeated by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in winding up for the Opposition. I refer to our view of the risks of ordinary social contact, including employment. It is extremely important to avoid a situation in which HIV carriers are treated as lepers and isolated from the community so that they lose their jobs and are no longer able to make a contribution to the community in a period when to all intents and purposes they are no threat to anyone in most normal activities. I suppose that I must accept that sex is a normal activity, but here I mean normal day to day social contact, including contact at the work place. It is important to make it clear that the Government's medical advice is that the AIDS virus cannot be contracted through normal social contact with an infected person. It cannot be transmitted by shaking hands and there is no record of anyone becoming infected through kissing. There is also no danger in sharing cups or cutlery, nor can it be caught in public toilets.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend. He was not present when I made my contribution, but I hope that he will read it. The medical advice that I have received is that it is not safe to make the comments that my hon. Friend has just made and that in the present state of medical knowledge it cannot be said conclusively that such activities are safe.

Mr. Newton: I apologise for not being present when my hon. Friend made his speech, but I am aware of what he said and I heard his intervention in a later speech. I can only say that my words are based on clear-cut expert medical advice to the Government from a wide variety of sources, focused through the Chief Medical Officer, and it is important that I should put them firmly on the record.

I have no means of validating or disproving the statistics given by my hon. Friend about Senegal, but one of the difficulties in some parts of Africa is that, quite apart from the possibility of infection as it exists in this country through the sharing of infected needles by drug abusers, the use of needles for normal health purposes cannot be guaranteed as safe in some areas. That may in itself be a potent source of infection, but it is quite different from ordinary social contact. I cannot speak authoritatively on this, but infected equipment may be a significant cause of the problem to which my hon. Friend adverted.

Dr. M. S. Miller: To answer the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), if an infected person has a bleeding gum or some other source of bleeding within the mouth and the person kissing him also has a sore or wound there is a possibility of transmission, but it is probable that the saliva would kill the organism as it is not easily viable outside its own environment.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has special medical expertise, for that intervention. His view corresponds precisely with that of the Government's expert medical advisers.

It is important that people should understand that an AIDS carrier is not a routine, automatic, daily risk in ordinary daily contact. It is important that that should be understood if we are to have a chance of carrying through a rational policy in a civilised society.

I intended to say a little more on that front, but I should like to consider employment, which the hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned. The House might know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General has been considering employment issues that are involved in and arise from AIDS. On Monday, he will launch a booklet for employers which we believe will make a helpful contribution to the overall Government campaign. It will underline some of what I have said in the past few minutes and to which, I know, many hon. Members attach importance.

The public education campaign has general support. I should like to extend an apology to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) for my absence and that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State during his speech. I know that he expressed some concern about that, but I hope that he is aware of the reason why we were unable to be here. He suggested that elderly people should be exempted from the leaflet delivery. I know that he feels that some elderly people might be upset if they are included, but some might be upset if they are excluded. In a country in which many elderly people live in households with people who are not elderly, the practical problem of drawing such a distinction would be insuperable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) suggested that we should make use of pharmacists. We are arranging for free distribution of the very good and full Health Education Council booklet through pharmacists, and expect to use it as a secondary source of distribution for the leaflet that will be delivered throughout the country.

I have noted the several arguments that were advanced about resources. As the hon. Members for Oldham, West, for Holborn and St. Pancras and others have acknowledged, extra funds have been made available to the NHS, especially to the Thames regions, which have the worst problems in providing treatment.

Some extra funds were made available last year, and we expect to make further money available this year and next to take account of the increasing work load throughout the country. I ask the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras to acknowledge that it is not so much the immediate size of the problem, although it is growing and we shall take account of that fact in our allocations, but the size of the problem in the future which will, or could, make really substantial demands on the NHS.

The principal need, but it is not the only one, is for districts to draw up plans on their projected provision for AIDS cases and the prevention of HIV infection and to get them back to the DHSS by the end of the year. We have commissioned a study on the cost of treating AIDS patients, and early next year we will sponsor a conference on the complex issue of predicting future trends. We hope, therefore, to be able to make a better assessment of NHS requirements in the longer term according to the best forecasts, rather than by plucking some figure out of the air.

None of that is an attempt to run away from the need to take account of the problem, especially for the Thames regions — though the problem will begin to spread beyond those regions; reference has already been made to Scotland — in distributing NHS money for next year. There have been substantial increases in total allocations and when considering the distribution of funds we shall have very much in mind what has been said in the debate.

A range of other matters have been raised, including important issues relating to the Public Health Laboratory Service. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and the House that we shall not allow to happen anything that, in our view, would jeopardise the provision of sensible testing arrangements for AIDS cases.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS (JOINT COMMITTEE)

Ordered,

That Mr. Alex Carlile be discharged from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and Mr. Michael Hancock be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Portillo.]

Brook General Hospital (Neurosciences Units)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I am grateful to have this early opportunity in the new Session to raise the subject of the proposed closure of the neurosciences units at the Brook General hospital.

A week ago I presented to the House a petition on behalf of the people served by, and the staff of, the unit at the Brook hospital. The petitioners were praying against the South-East Thames regional health authority's proposal to move the units to a large new centre for neurosciences which is to be built at Denmark Hill and linked to the Maudsley and King's College hospitals.

I mentioned last week that the petitioners had also presented on the same day a petition to the Secretary of State for Social Services that was signed by 200,000 people. The Minister for Health, who is to reply to the debate, may have seen that petition. I thank him for his presence today and congratulate him on his new appointment.

The Minister should be made aware straightaway that this is a major issue, not just in my constituency, not just in the borough of Greenwich and not even just throughout the boroughs of Lewisham, Bromley and Bexley. It is a major issue throughout the region, especially in Kent.

I cannot believe that the regional health authority has made a proposal that has met with such universal hostility —and yet perhaps I can believe it, because a few years ago the South-East Thames regional health authority proposed that the cardiac unit at the Brook should be closed. That proposal also met with universal hostility, and I am glad that the present Paymaster General, who was then the Minister for Health, had the good sense to reject that proposal. I earnestly hope that the new Minister will follow his example in this case.

Suffice it to say in this short debate that the community health councils of Bexley, Canterbury and Thanet, Lewisham and North Southwark, Camberwell, where the Maudsley hospital is situated, and Lewisham and Greenwich have all come out against the proposal. So, significantly, has the South-East Thames Regional Association of Community Health Councils. I believe that many hon. Members from all parts of the House representing constituencies in the region are also opposed to the proposal. I am pleased to see that the hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) is present. He has told me of his opposition.

Why all this opposition? Many of the letters that I have received, some from people living far beyond the borders of my constituency, express a real fear. I have had quoted to me the comment of a parent of one patient:

"Today is my son's 24th birthday, an event that would not have occurred but for the skill of doctor Sharr and the neuroscience department of the Brook hospital . . . The journey from Queen Mary's hospital to the Brook was less than 10 minutes and in a further 10 minutes he was in the operating theatre. I was later advised that any delay would certainly have left him handicapped for life, if not dead."

The Greenwich and Bexley family practitioner committee has rightly described the major problems of accessibility to the Denmark Hill site. It stated:

"The road network around Denmark Hill is almost continuously congested; parking facilities in the area are almost non-existent and rail access to Denmark Hill is not possible during the late evening or at weekends to the majority of people living in Kent."

That imposes an almost insuperable problem for patients, relatives and staff. In contrast, the Brook General hospital is almost ideally located and will become, within a year or so, even better located. The completion of the Rochester Way relief road and the major improvements currently being made at the London end of the A20-M20 and the M25 mean that, on grounds of accessibility alone, the Brook hospital wins hands down.

Lives can be saved which would otherwise be lost and handicap, as a result of head injury, can be reduced. The Minister might note that the very existence of the motorway network regretfully may bring the possibility of accidents involving head injury for which the facility at the Brook hospital is already strategically placed.

The thousands of people protesting against the proposal are right in their belief that the neurosciences unit should be sited close to the population, especially for the younger element which it will serve. That is true of the Brook, but it is not true of the Maudsley. Population is likely to increase in Greenwich, Bromley and Bexley and throughout Kent, whereas there is little or no population growth in the inner London boroughs.

It is quite clear that the Maudsley unit does not, in the main, serve the region. Some 38 per cent. of its patients are not resident in the region and a further 35 per cent. are residents of the teaching districts. However, almost all the patients admitted to the Brook units are residents of the South-East Thames region.

The South-East Thames regional health authority's recommendations are based upon a report by the option appraisal team. It was set up after years of indecision in the region that resulted from a lack of agreement by the relevant authorities and financial difficulties stemming from the harsh application of the RAWP formula to the region and to the special health authority. I fully appreciate the difficulties under which the RHA has been labouring over the past decade or so. However, it is at least relevant to remind the RHA of the principles upon which the RAWP formula was based:

"Health care is for people and clearly a primary determinant of need must be the size of the population."

Of course, that posed a problem for the London medical schools which are located in areas of static or even declining population. However, where a courageous decision was taken—like that to remove St. George's hospital, near Hyde Park, to Tooting—it resulted in a secure and successful solution to the problem.

The Flowers committee underlined the wisdom of maintaining and developing hospital facilities in outer London and beyond. It spelt out the inevitability that some of the London teaching hospitals should merge and even that one should close. Again, the London Health Planning Consortium, on the specific issue of the debate, decided that two neuroscience centres were required for the South-East Thames region and recommended that the regional unit at the Brook should be rebuilt, preferably at the Brook, or at Queen Mary's hospital at Sidcup. The unit at the Maudsley, it said, should be retained but did not require substantial investment.

It is clear that the South-East Thames regional health authority, by proposing one unit combining the Brook and Maudsley on the Denmark Hill site, ignored the advice of the London Health Planning Consortium and the Flowers committee. It is not for me to dilate on the reasons that lie behind the RHA decision. However, I can only guess that the members believed that combining the Maudsley and the Brook would achieve a degree of rationalisation. This can only be a solution based on a superficial appraisal.

The Minister may know that the option appraisal team was divided on its recommendations. The recommendations which were made and embodied in the regional health authority's proposals are seriously flawed for the following reasons. First, a simple consideration of the geography of South-East Thames should show an unbiased observer that a single unit, wherever placed, could never match the capabilities of the existing separate units. Secondly, each unit supplies functions which, although superficially similar, are distinctly different. The Maudsley scientific services have an accent upon teaching, research and psychiatry, for which they possess an international reputation. The Brook units are there primarily to serve regional neurology and neurosurgery patients in South-East Thames.

The extreme irony of the business is that, in making its proposals, the regional health authority is cutting off its nose to spite its face. It has no jurisdiction over the Maudsley and little over the teaching hospitals. It can control only the units at the Brook hospital, which it proposes to close. Its proposal is extravagant and involves an estimated cost of £30 million—a matter that will be of some interest to the Minister.

On all counts, I strongly urge the Minister to heed the advice of the London Health Planning Consortium and the Flowers committee, both of which recommended leaving the centres where they are. Thus, the taxpayer would be saved a huge sum of money, and serious disruption and disturbance would be avoided.

2.41 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Has the hon. Gentleman sought leave to intervene in the debate?

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should have been informed.

Mr. Barnett: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Townsend: As my constituency boundary is only a few yards from the unit, I appreciate the opportunity of linking my constituents with the admirable case that has been made by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett). I wish to tell my hon. Friend the Minister for Health of the deep feelings that the issue has aroused in my constituency and in the other two constituencies in Bexley. On medical and economic grounds, the hon. Gentleman's case is overwhelming.

2.42 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): May I respond to the kind initial remarks of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) by congratulating him on having secured this Adjournment debate and the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) in raising this matter, which has caused considerable anxiety in his constituency. That anxiety was underlined by the way in which the hon. Gentleman spoke in this short debate. Of course, I am aware of the issue because of representations already made to Ministers by right hon. and hon. Members and because of the wealth of material that has been sent to us by members of the public to express their interest in the matter. Indeed, although "Save The Brook Neuroscience Unit" is probably not the world's catchiest slogan, it has registered with the DHSS and will continue to make an impact in the period ahead.

I understand why such strong feelings have come into play. Big new developments are taking place in the neurosciences which hold out a real promise of alleviating some old and intractable health problems. After all, it is only a decade since computerised tomography gave us the first pain-free insight into the workings of the brain and nervous system. Now, those CT scanners are in their second and third generations and have been joined by magnetic resonance imaging, on which I was privileged to listen to a short lecture in Sheffield two or three evenings ago and which I understand shows in more detail the soft tissue of the brain.

Many people stand to be helped by those new developments. They include the young child with febrile convulsions, youngsters with head injuries — head injuries cause no less than 15 per cent. of deaths among 17 to 25-year-olds, many of which are a result of motorcycle accidents—and all those with brain tumors, Parkinson's disease and other forms of intractable pain.

After the difficulties that we were exploring in the previous debate on AIDS, it is encouraging to be taking part in a debate which, whatever else, is a part of health care where there is a great deal of optimism and the excitement of so many new possibilities for treatment or care.

I am sure that this is appreciated, at least as a general proposition, by the hon. Member for Greenwich and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath. In medical science, as in any endeavour, resources must be concentrated and used to the best effect. That is particularly so at times of accelerated movement, as there is at the moment in neural sciences. If efforts are unfocused they will tend to dissipate, and the results for which we are looking will take that much longer to achieve.

It is not just a question of money, although, with something like a magnetic resonance imager costing about £2·5 million, there is a need to take value for money into account. Primarily it is a matter of skill and expertise. As the hon. Member will know, a consultant will today specialise not just in neuro surgery but in paediatric neuro surgery, anuerism or tumor surgery, or on the problems of intractable pain. The demand for such specialists is competitive and international. That gives some signal of why, in general terms, we think it important for each regional health authority to employ its resources of manpower, no less than its resources of capital, or revenue for other purposes, to achieve the best possible results.

South-East Thames regional health authority is no exception to this. At present it is fortunate in having no fewer than four neural science centres serving people in Kent and south London. There are neuroscience beds at St. Thomas' hospital as part of its teaching complement and neuroscience and surgery beds at Guy's, some of which form part of that hospital's famous paediatric unit. Then, and this brings us immediately closer to the issue that has been concerning the hon. Member for Greenwich, there are the two major centres of neurology and neuro sciences at the Brook hospital and the Maudsley and

[Mr. Tony Newton]

King's college hospital, known jointly as Denmark Hill. The population of east Sussex is catered for by Hurstwood park hospital in the South-West Thames region.

Four such centres, competing for skilled staff and resources, appeared to South-East Thames regional health authority to be more than can be justified to serve a 3 million population in Kent and south-east London. So, in 1984-85 it undertook an appraisal of development operations which would carefully weigh different factors to arrive at a choice for the siting of neuroscience centres to serve that area. All the factors weighed were those touched on by the hon. Member for Greenwich. They were relative travelling times, the state of the buildings, timing and potential disturbances and, most importantly, the integration of the service.

Against that general background, there would probably be no disagreement in principle that it was not unreasonable for the regional health authority to undertake such an exercise and that it would be the right body to undertake it, since it is for the health authorities, within broad policy guidelines set by the Department, to decide on the pattern of local health care. I have only a relatively limited experience as Minister for Health, but I have considerable experience in the DHSS. The Government would be in a hopeless position if they sought to take to themselves detailed decisions about the pattern of health services in every local area. The whole system would rapidly break down if we sought to do that.

South-East Thames regional health authority is responsible for providing a neuroscience service, one way or another, to its catchment population. Out of the corner of my eye I have caught sight of a former member of the regional health authority, my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch). In the light of what was said earlier, my hon. Friend may be relieved that he no longer has such responsibilities on his plate. But I am glad to note the continuing interest in these matters of a former member of the regional health authority. That authority is responsible for providing a neuroscience service in one way or another to its catchment population. It funds the service for Kent and south-east London to the tune of more than £7·25 million a year, which represents just under 1 per cent. of its total annual revenue budget. That running cost is quite apart from the enormous cost of purchasing capital equipment, such as the magnetic resonance imager.

As a result of that appraisal of development options, the authority has produced a scheme to centralise its neurological service, together with the bulk of neurology beds and other appropriate back-up services, at Denmark Hill while still supporting the teaching commitment at St. Thomas' and Guy's. As a consequence of that scheme, the proposal is that the neuroscience unit at the Brook hospital in Greenwich should be closed.

I know that the hon. Member for Greenwich and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath will understand that it is not for me this afternoon to pass judgment on the region's proposed schemes. I am fairly confident that they would not expect me to do so, for a reason that will become clear in a moment. If I had not known, I would have been made well aware in this debate that the Greenwich health authority feels the proposed loss of the neuroscience unit at the Brook hospital very keenly. I fully understand the reasons for that. But the region's proposal is at present exactly that—a proposal. It is not just about to be put into effect, and it will not be until some very well-defined procedures are observed. I refer to precisely those procedures that make it impossible for me to express a personal or ministerial view this afternoon.

Local consultation on the proposed closure of the Brook neuroscience unit has just ended. Several local interests felt strongly enough to respond. Because of the opposition of the Greenwich community health council, the proposal will automatically be referred to the regional health authority and will, I believe, reach it in January. I should stress that it is the members of the regional health authority who will consider the proposal and the comments received on it. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Greenwich and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath have made their views known to the regional chairman, but if by chance they have not done so, I urge them so to do. The chairman will certainly ensure that they are conveyed to the authority's members.

If the regional health authority cannot reach a solution that is acceptable to Greenwich health authority and to the Greenwich CHC, the matter will be referred to Ministers for a final decision. It is at that point that I and my colleagues would have to make a judgment. I should make it clear that Ministers do not see their role as simply rubber stamping the many proposals that arrive on our desks for final decision. We have to make a judgment, taking account of all the factors, including those that swayed the health authorities in putting forward the proposals in the first place. But I can assure the hon. Member for Greenwich and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath that their views, which were so ably and eloquently expressed, as well as those expressed by other local interests such as the Greenwich health authority and the Greenwich CHC, will be looked at carefully and balanced against the case put to us, if such occurs, by the regional health authority.

In many ways, it is helpful to have a debate of this sort, as it at least ensures that we are aware of the strength of feeling and of the considerations that have led people to believe that a wrong decision is being made, so that we can take them fully and properly into account if the matter comes to us for decision. It may seem slightly odd for a Minister who has been detained in the House for a further half hour at the end of a long day's debate on a difficult and complex subject to say this, but, as I said at the beginning of the debate, I am grateful to both hon. Members for the trouble they took to bring this issue to my attention.

Mr. Barnett: I thank the Minister for his reply.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Three o'clock.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Short Brothers plc

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about Government funding to Short Brothers plc, for the year ending 31 March 1987.

Mr. Tom King: Following consideration of Shorts' 1985 corporate plan update, the Government have authorised an external funding limit of £36 million covering the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1987. The Government are, however, concerned about the downturn in Shorts' financial performance in 1985-86 and will be reviewing shortly the strategic plans for the business with the company. In addition, the normal close monitoring of the company's performance will be maintained.

Government policy in relation to those dealing with the company remains as stated in the House of Commons on 23 December 1981, at column 411.

Departmental services

Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the cash limit for Northern Ireland departmental services for 1986-87.

Mr. Scott: The cash limit for Northern Ireland departmental services (NIDI) for 1986-87 has been increased by £7·9 million, from £2,292·2 million to £2,300·1 million. This reflects three additions: £1·6 million in respect of a final assessment of the net changes to the Northern Ireland programme to reflect changes in comparable programmes in England in the 1985 public expenditure survey; £5·2 million following the package of enterprise and employment measures for Northern Ireland announced on 26 March; and £1·6 million to enable hospital and community health services to continue to be delivered and developed as planned following the decision to implement from 1 July 1986 the recommendations of the NHS pay review bodies as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 22 May, at columns 239-44. These three increases are offset by a reduction reflecting a transfer of £0·5 million from the NIDI cash limit to the cash limits of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland in respect of the transfer of milk quota announced on 18 September. The total increase of £7·9 million is being met from the reserve and does not therefore add to the total of public expenditure.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Royal Greenwich Observatory

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has given his approval to the Science and Engineering Research Council's proposal to move the Royal Greenwich Observatory from Herstmonceux to Cambridge.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has now given the necessary approvals in principle in connection with the Science and Engineering Research Council's proposal to move the Royal Greenwich Observatory to Cambridge.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Local Authority Finance

Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to make any changes to the local authority capital cash limits.

Mr. Hurd: To provide for supplementary capital allocations totalling £5·4 million which have been agreed for the fire and civil defence authorities in Greater Manchester, South Yorkshire and Tyne and Wear for 1986-87, the cash limit DOE-LA1 (capital expenditure in England by local authorities) has been increased by £5·4 million, from £2,361·2 million to £2,366·6 million and the cash limit HO-LA1 (local authority expenditure for capital projects on magistrates courts, probation and police service) has been correspondingly reduced from £132 million to £126·6 million. This transfer will have no effect on the public expenditure planning total for 1986-87.

Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes are to be made to his Department's control over capital allocations for police, magistrates' courts and probation office buildings.

Mr. Hurd: Following consultations with the relevant representative organisations, two Home Office circulars were issued on 11 November setting out new procedures for obtaining Home Office approval for schemes for police, magistrates' courts and probation office buildings and capital allocations for such schemes.

The main purpose of the changes is to provide a framework for getting better value for money from these capital allocations and the specific grant which the Home Office pays in respect of expenditure arising from them, and to reduce the level of central Government involvement in the detail of individual schemes.

The principal change is that instead of the detailed submissions required under the existing unit cost control system, The responsible authorities will send to the Home Office investment appraisals of schemes estimated to cost £1 million or more. This will place more clearly on the authorities responsibility for obtaining value for money in individual schemes. The new procedures will operate from 15 December.

Designer Drugs

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action the Government propose to take to deal with the potential problem of designer drugs.

Mr. Mellor: The Government are grateful to the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs for its prompt and thorough examination of this problem. In the light of advice from the council, and following consultations with the interested trade and professional bodies, we propose to counter the serious threat which these substances pose by extending the controls of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and its regulations to cover certain uncontrolled analogues of the drugs fentanyl and pethidine. As a first step, the necessary modification order is being laid before Parliament today. If approved by both Houses, the new controls would come into operation on 1 April 1987.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing and Planning Act 1986

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the provisions of the Housing and Planning Act 1986 on the right to buy will be brought into force.

Mr. John Patten: A commencement order will shortly be made bringing sections 1 to 4 into operation on 7 January. From that date the discount scale for flats bought under the right to buy will run from 44 per cent. by 2 per cent. steps to 70 per cent., and there will be new protections against unexpectedly high service charges. For both houses and flats the period during which there is a liability to repay discount on resale will go down from five to three years. This will apply to former tenants who have already bought their homes at a discount, provided that they do not sell before 7 January.

Section 5, which concerns loans in respect of service charges, and section 8, which provides for the right to buy to be preserved when tenanted property is transferred to the private sector, will be brought into force early next year when the regulations for which the sections provided have been prepared.

Livestock Units

Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reached a decision on the proposals to control the erection of livestock units near residential property set out in his Department's consultation paper on 23 January 1984.

Mr. Ridley: We have considered the many representations received in response to the Department's consultation paper, which proposed that the erection of livestock units within 100 m of residential and similar property should require specific planning permission. At present many such livestock units benefit from the deemed planning permission given by class VI of the General Development Order.

It was clear from the responses to the consultation paper that the erection of livestock buildings near residential and other property is an issue about which many individuals and organisations feel strongly. The vast majority of respondents considered that the problems caused by the erection of new livestock units, particularly those of noise and smell, would not adequately be dealt with by requiring that only those within 100 m of existing residential property should be the subject of specific planning permission. On the other hand, it is important not to impose new burdens on the farming industry without clear justification.

We have reconsidered the proposals against that background and have concluded that it would be appropriate to set the boundary within which new livestock units in England and Wales should require specific planning permission at 400 m from existing permanent buildings (except other farm buildings, or special industrial buildings: that is, those comprised in classes V-IX of the current Use Classes Order). The controls will apply to all units erected for housing livestock; it would not be practicable to seek to distinguish "intensive" livestock units from those where livestock are housed more traditionally. They will also apply to the erection or construction on farm land of buildings or structures designed to deal with the waste products of the animals housed in the unit—for example, slurry tanks or lagoons — and to construction of sewage sludge lagoons on agricultural land.

I should emphasise that the Government are seeking to ensure only that, in certain defined circumstances, livestock units shall require prior planning permission, in the same way as most other types of development. It remains our policy that there is a general presumption in favour of allowing applications for development, having regard to all material considerations, unless that development would cause demonstrable harm to interests of acknowledged importance.

These changes will be brought into effect by means of amendments to class VI of the General Development Order, as part of the further amendments to and simplification and consolidation of the order which we hope to lay before Parliament later this Session.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Employee Share Schemes

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the material interest rules in sections 285 and 303 Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, in particular as they apply to approved employee share schemes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. The present rules require that, where an individual has an interest in a trust, any shares in that trust and the personal holdings of the trust's other beneficiaries have to be aggregated with the individual's own holdings, and those of his close relatives, in determining whether he has a "material interest" in a company. It has been suggested that this rule may operate too restrictively in connection with approved employee share schemes — employees who have a "material interest" in a company cannot participate in such schemes. To remove any possible doubts about the operation of the "material interest" rules, which apply to various parts of the tax code, we propose introducing in next year's Finance Bill:

(i) a minor modification to section 303 as it applies for all purposes, and

(ii) minor amendments to the approved employee share scheme legislation.

Further details, including the proposed starting dates for these changes, are given in an Inland Revenue press release, copies of which I am placing in the Library. This also outlines some complementary arrangements which do not require legislation.

CIVIL SERVICE

House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975

Mr. Nicholls asked the Minister for the Civil Service what arrangements are to be made to provide hon. Members with information about the amendments contained in the resolution tabled on 12 November updating schedule 1 to the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975.

Mr. Luce: A detailed explanatory note is available from the Vote Office.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Stock Exchange

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in the light of the Stock Exchange and International Securities Regulatory Organisation merger, what discussions he has had regarding the access available to British investment firms in Japan.

Mr. Channon: I welcome the vote by Stock Exchange members in support of the merger with the International Securities Regulatory Organisation. This is a considerable step forward both in terms of strengthening the central market in equities and putting into place the new self-regulatory structure.

London's strong position as an international financial centre means that I welcome the participation in the United Kingdom's financial markets of foreign companies of high repute. But I am also concerned to see that our firms have reciprocal opportunities in markets overseas, especially in the world's leading financial centres. That is why the Financial Services Act, which will come into force during 1987, contains reciprocity powers applicable to every investment firm doing business here, irrespective of the form of authorisation to do investment business under the Financial Services Act.

I would expect Japan to provide British firms reciprocal access to their markets, in particular to the Tokyo Stock Exchange. Although I understand that further securities branch licences are to be issued to British firms, I do not consider that such reciprocal access has yet been provided.

I shall be visiting Japan towards the end of this month. During my visit I shall be discussing with the Japanese authorities the access for British firms to Japanese financial markets, including the Tokyo Stock Exchange.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Tenancy Agreements

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking following the House of Lords judgment in the case of Williams v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Jopling: Action is in hand to implement the obligations confirmed by the judgment. Consultations will shortly take place with the remaining tenants to establish how this can best be arranged.

SCOTLAND

Livestock Units

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has reached a decision on the proposals to control the erection of livestock units near residential properties set out in the consultation paper issued by the Scottish Development Department on 23 January 1984.

Mr. Rifkind: I have carefully considered the representations received in response to the consultation paper, which proposed that buildings for housing pigs and poultry and associated structures should need planning permission if they were to be larger than 465 sq m in area and erected within 400 m of residential and similar properties. At present many such buildings benefit from the deemed planning permission given by class V of the General Development Order. The proposals were generally welcomed and were accepted by the National Farmers Union of Scotland. Several respondents, including the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, suggested that control should be extended to cover buildings housing rabbits and animals bred for their skins and fur and we have amended our proposals accordingly. I should emphasise that in proposing such controls we are not seeking to prevent the establishment of such buildings, only to ensure that they require planning permission in the same way as most other types of development. These changes will be brought into effect by means of amendments to class V of the General Development (Scotland) Order, as part of the further amendments to and consolidation of the order which we hope to lay before Parliament during this Session. At the same time we intend to clarify the test governing the exercise of class V rights.

DEFENCE

Police

Mr. Whitfield asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to rationalise the powers of the Ministry of Defence police force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is the Government's intention to introduce such a Bill in this Session. The Bill will make provision for the Defence Police Federation.

Rapier

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the further development of the Rapier air defence system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The development of Rapier field standard C has been proceeding for some time under a limited contract. I am glad to be able to say that a contract to cover the completion of the development programme and the supply of an initial quantity of equipment for service with the Army and the Royal Air Force has been placed with the Army weapons division of British Aerospace.

Rapier FSC is being developed to match the greatly increased sophistication of the threat anticipated in the 1990s and beyond, and will provide a major enhancement to our air defence capability.

The total value of the contract, including that of the work already done, is close to £1,000 million. British Aerospace and the Ministry of Defence have agreed on incentive pricing arrangements, bounded by a maximum price to the Ministry, for the whole of this work.

It is expected that contract will provide employment for about 10,000 people at the "peak" of the programme.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General whether the Director of Public Prosecutions has yet made a decision about the alleged abuses of the police national computer by an alleged homosexual ring operating within the Force; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No decision has yet been taken about the case to which the hon. Member refers.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on procedures for following up Monopolies and Mergers Commission reports on the nationalised industries.

Mr. MacGregor: In order that MMC studies of nationalised industries are effective, proper follow up is necessary. The Government have reviewed existing arrangements with a view to ensuring that procedures are adequate in this regard.

The primary responsibility for considering the recommendations of an MMC report, and for taking the action on them which is judged appropriate, lies with the board of the industry concerned. At present, an industry normally gives its initial response to an MMC report within three to four months of publication. This is followed by a further statement on progress after 12 months explaining the action taken and the results achieved. In practice within this framework, response times have to take account of the differing circumstances of industries and the differing scope of individual MMC reports.

Having reviewed the present arrangements, the Government have concluded that, in general, they work well. However, there is some scope for improvement in three regards. First, the existing procedures should be revised as necessary to ensure that they operate as intended. Second, where an agreed programme of follow-up action extends over longer than 12 months, a reporting gap exists at present, and this should be filled. Third, to ensure that follow-up action is not only taken but is seen to be taken, the industries' progress statements should be given some form of publicity.

The Government have therefore agreed with the nationalised industries' chairmen's group, the following strengthening of existing arrangements:

(a) In their first responses to MMC reports, the industries should continue to set out the ways they intend to approach follow-up action and the timetable to which they plan to work. Their 12-month statements of progress should explain what has been achieved by then and reconfirm, if necessary, the timetable for completing action.

(b) Progress in these regards should continue to be routinely examined when an industry's performance is reviewed in the context of Corporate Plan discussions.

(c) To ensure that these procedures work as effectively as possible, industries should consider, in conjunction with their sponsor Departments, ways of presenting their action programmes in as specific a form as is practicable, so as to facilitate subsequent checks of performance against plans. The MMC have agreed to frame the recommendations in their reports with this aim in mind.

While this approach provides a guide to the follow-up procedures which should normally be taken in respect of MMC recommendations, it should not preclude the sponsor Departments from seeking more rigorous arrangements in the case of particularly adverse MMC findings.

The time taken to complete follow-up will necessarily vary, but in all cases the Government would expect follow-up action to be completed within a maximum of three years of the MMC's original report. Once follow-up action is completed, the industry will produce a final progress report recording what has been done and setting out the improvements that have been achieved. The Government think that this would strengthen accountability and be generally welcomed in Parliament and outside. Once follow-up is completed, decisions can be taken on whether any re-reference to the MMC is necessary. The precise nature of the publicity to be given to industries' final progress reports will be agreed on each occasion with the industry concerned.

Civil Service Manpower

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if copies of the annual report by the Treasury on Civil Service manpower reductions in 1985-86 will be made available to hon. Members.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. The 1985-86 annual report has been given to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee and copies will be placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Banking Services

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will review matters relating to the law affecting banking services.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Banking Bill, which is published today, is designed to provide the statutory basis for the important regulatory improvements which were identified in the White paper "Banking Supervision" in December 1985 (Cmnd. 9695). It overhauls and reinforces the system of banking supervision enacted in the Banking Act 1979. The Government have also this year modernised the regulatory framework of building societies (the Building Societies Act 1986) and fundamentally recast the law relating to securities and investments (the Financial Services Act 1986). Together these measures represent a comprehensive reform of the law relating to the protection of depositors and investors.

Banks and their customers are also affected by the body of statute law and precedent which is not concerned with prudential supervision but which governs the mechanics of banking, such as the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879, the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 and the Cheques Act 1957. The law should provide the necessary legal framework for the provision of banking services on fair and efficient terms. Generally, United Kingdom banking law has stood up well to the test of time. But the nature of banking has changed beyond recognition since the main statutes were drafted. In its White Paper the Government accepted the case for one amendment to remove a possible constraint on EFT-POS transactions by debit card. However, it would be valuable to have a full and coherent review of the law relating to banking mechanisms and practices, taking into account technological and other developments and drawing on the experience of bankers, their personal and business customers and other interested parties. Moreover my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in the course of seeking views from organisations representing the credit industry, consumers and enforcement authorities about possible amendments to the Consumer Credit Act. The amendment referred to in the White Paper is therefore not included in the Bill which has been introduced.

The Government have decided to set up, in co-operation with the Bank of England, an independent review for this purpose. Further details of the review, whose proposed terms of reference are as shown, will be announced later. The review is flexibly defined to include banking services in the broadest sense, but it will not include the law protecting depositors and investors to which I have already referred. Nor will it be concerned with questions of taxation, or with market-related matters such as the granting or cost of credit or the competitive pricing of other banking services.

Terms of reference

The purpose of the review is to examine the statute and common law relating to the provision of banking services within the United Kingdom to personal and business customers, including payment and remittance services; but excluding taxation, company law and parts of the law whose relevance is to trading or to the provision of services in general, rather than particularly to banking. The objectives of the review will be:

(1) to examine the law and its practical implications from the points of view of banker, customer and the general public interest in the availability, reliability, security and efficient and effective operation of payment, remittance and other banking services;

(2) to have regard to:

(a) current and prospective developments in banking and payment systems, including developments in electronic data processing and electronic funds transfer technology;

(b) areas of particular difficulty in or confusion about existing law and practice and the rights and obligations of banks and their customers respectively;

(c) differences in the law and practice of different parts of the United Kindom and, where relevant, other studies and reviews of United Kingdom law;

(d) developments in the law of the European Community and in other relevant international laws and conventions;

(e) developments and trends in international payment systems and reviews by international bodies;

(3) to prepare a final report, and if necessary interim reports also;

(4) if appropriate and after consultation to recommend the introduction of codes of good practice (on such matters as model contract terms, information for customers or new banking procedures);

(5) if necessary and after consultation to make proposals for legislation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Air Weapons

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are any plans to hold further campaigns to discourage the misuse of air weapons.

Mr. Hurd: Local campaigns will run in the west midlands and Greater Manchester for three weeks from 17 November to 6 December and from 24 November to 13 December respectively. The aim will be to encourage more responsible use of air weapons and to reduce the number of recorded offences involving air weapons. We shall consider, in the light of our evaluation of these pilot campaigns, whether to run similar ones next year in other police force areas where the incidence of air weapon misuse is high.

Regional Crime Squads

Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received the report of the review of the regional crime squads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: My predecessor established in 1985 a review of the effectiveness, management and financing of Regional Crime Squads. The review was conducted by representatives of the local authority and police associations under Home Office chairmanship. Their report, which is unanimous, makes a number of valuable recommendations which I accept.

I particularly welcome the renewed commitment of all concerned in the tripartite structure of regional crime squads, and the valuable contribution which the review makes to improving their efficiency and effectiveness. I am placing a copy of the report in the Library. Advice will shortly be issued to police authorities and chief officers of police on the implementation of the report's recommendations.

ENVIRONMENT

Residuary Bodies (Meetings)

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Government's policy towards the admission of the public to meetings of residuary bodies.

Dr. Boyson: The Government's policy remains as accepted by Parliament during the passage of the Local Government Act 1985. We accept that residuary bodies need to be accountable. The 1985 Act therefore imposes on them an audit regime which gives public access to their accounts. It requires them to produce an annual report which my right hon. Friend must lay before Parliament. The conduct of the bodies is within the purview of the Parliamentary Commissioner. That is an appropriate regime of accountability for bodies of this kind. But for the public to have the right to come to the formal sessions of the bodies is quite inappropriate and unnecessary. It would be wrong to impose such a burden on bodies which are, in fact, a managerial team with a large number of responsibilities, mostly administrative, with a limited life, and with no powers to initiate policies.

That is the reason why the Public Bodies (Admission to Meetings) Act 1960 was not applied to residuary bodies.

It has recently been suggested that the 1960 Act may, in fact, apply by reason of the definition of "rate" in the Public Works Loans Act 1875 and paragraph 1*(h)* of the Schedule to the 1960 Act. My right hon. Friend has therefore made an order to avoid any doubt that, as Parliament intended, the 1960 Act does not apply to residuary bodies.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Potato Marketing Scheme

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received the report of the public inquiry into the objections made to the proposed amendment to the potato marketing scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales and I have received the report of His Honour David Peck, who conducted the public inquiry into objections to the proposed amendments to the potato marketing scheme. The main effects of the amendments would be to:—

(i) increase the maximum excess area contribution from 5 to 10 times the formula rate used to work out the level of producers' ordinary contributions; and

(ii) increase the maximum penalty on producers for supplying false information to the Board, and other similar offences, from £200 to £2,000.

The report recommends that these two amendments should be adopted subject to one modification. This is that the maximum excess contribution should be increased in two stages, from five to seven times the formula rate for the 1987 and 1988 crops, with a further increase to 10 times the rate thereafter. Ministers have accepted these recommendations and notice of the modification has been given today to the Potato Marketing Board. If the board accepts the modfication the amendments (as modified) will be laid before Parliament shortly.

The report also makes recommendations on a number of administrative points, which will be taken up with the board.

The report of the Inquiry is being published today and I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the the Library of the House. I have written to His Honour David Peck, on behalf of the Agriculture Ministers, thanking him for a comprehensive report.

TRANSPORT

EC (Transport Council)

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the outcome of the Council of European Community Transport Ministers held in Brussels on 10 and 11 November.

Mr. Moore: The Transport Council earlier this week concentrated primarily on the content of a first three-year step towards liberalisation of air transport in the Community by the agreed target date of 1992. While some progress was made on the important issues of capacity controls and access to the market, there was a disappointing unwillingness on the part of some countries to make progress on the vital issue of air forces.

A substantial majority in the Council now supports the United Kingdom's proposal that, as a first step, restrictive capacity sharing agreements which currently require airlines operating between two countries to share capacity on a 50:50 national basis should be loosened to 60:40 within three years — so that there can be real competition for capacity. A substantial majority also supports our ideas for allowing additional airlines to compete on existing routes, and for enabling airlines to open up new services, particularly on the important routes linking regional and "hub" airports. On fares, six countries, and the European Commission, support our efforts to ensure that airlines are free to offer the public new types of fare at genuinely low levels, and without the sort of restrictive conditions, such as the requirement to stay six nights or a Saturday night, which limit the usefulness of many cheap fares at present. I made clear that, unless there was reform of fares arrangements in this way, the United Kingdom would not be able to agree to the package of aviation measures under discussion.

The Council also discussed a number of inland transport items. It agreed on the objectives and criteria for a medium term programme for supporting transport infrastructure projects and also considered the next steps for work on liberalisation of road haulage on the basis of new Commission proposals.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Schools and Voluntary Colleges

33. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners how much the Church Commissioners have contributed to church schools and voluntary colleges in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners have made no such contribution, since they have no powers to do so.

Incumbents (Expenses)

34. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what proportion of total expenses claimed by incumbents were not reimbursed in each of the last five years.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The proportion of total parochial expenses of incumbents not reimbursed in each of the last five years has varied between 21 per cent. and 19 per cent. Following are the figures:

The proportion of total expenses claimed by incumbents and not reimbursed in each of the last five years:

	per cent.
1981	21
1982	20·5
1983	20
1984	19
1985-86[1]	19

[1] Year to 31 March.

"Faith in the City"

35. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what action the Church Commissioners have taken to follow up the recommendations made to them in the report of the Archbishop of Canterbury's advisory commission on urban priority areas entitled "Faith in the City".

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners warmly welcomed the report "Faith in the City". They have provided the secretariat for the working group set up by the General Synod to establish the Church urban fund. Last week the General Synod gave general approval to legislation enabling the commissioners to make grants or loans to the fund.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Development Council

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Community Development Council on 11 November.

Mr. Chris Patten: I chaired the Council. The United Kingdom was represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar).

Discussion at the Council centred on reform of the Community's food aid programme. The Council agreed a common position on a new food aid regulation aimed at improving food aid policy and management. It will lead to faster and more appropriate responses in emergencies, more efficient procedures, a relaxation of the rules governing the purchase of food aid from outside the Community, and better links between food aid and other Community development assistance. Conciliation with the European Parliament on two institutional issues will take place as soon as possible.

The Council also adopted a resolution establishing for the first time guidelines on use of Community aid to support developing countries' policies towards population growth.

The Council congratulated the Commission on negotiating national programmes of aid from the sixth European Development Fund (EDF VI) to the 66 African, Caribbean and Pacific countries that have signed the third Lomé convention. The Council noted the determination of many developing countries in Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific to continue with or embark on the process of reform and adjustment which is necessary if aid is to be effective. A financial regulation was also adopted containing detailed provisions for the implementation of EDF VI.

The Council also congratulated the Commission on the implementation of the Community's rehabilitation plan for countries in Africa worst affected by famine in 1985; and it discussed proposals on how to provide compensation for loss of agricultural export earnings to least developed countries not signatory to the Lomé convention and on the Community's aid programme to Asia and Latin America.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General (1) what precise information he gave to the Secretary to the Cabinet about the consequences which would follow if an official inquiry were not established into the circumstances surrounding the leak of the Solicitor General's letter of 6 January concerning the Westland affair; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he was asked, during the course of the internal inquiry into the disclosure of the Solicitor General's letter of 6 January to the then Secretary of State for Defence, to consider granting immunity from prosecution to Mr. Bernard Ingham;

(3) if he will outline the grounds on which he based his statement to the Prime Minister that he was satisfied that the offer of immunity from prosecution to an individual in connection with the disclosure of official information relating to the Westland affair in no way interfered with the course of justice; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether, in his meeting with the Director of Public Prosecutions and senior Treasury counsel on 23 January, the role of Downing street officials was discussed;

(5) what preparatory action he took and what discussions he had with the Director of Public Prosecutions and his staff concerning the possibility of a police inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the leak of the Solicitor General's letter of 6 January, in the event that an official internal inquiry into the leak were not established; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have nothing to add to the full account given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and by me to the House and by Sir Robert Armstrong to the Select Committee on Defence.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teacher Pilot Schemes

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to which English local education authorities he will allocate resources concerning the appraisal of teacher pilot schemes; how much money is allocated to each local education authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: No decision has yet been taken. I have received, via the local authority associations, submissions from 18 English local education authorities. Under the education support grant arrangements, resources have been set aside to fund a pilot project. That project is scheduled to begin in January 1987. I am considering which of the 18 applicants to select to form the pilot. In reaching this decision, I will take into account the views expressed at the inaugural meeting of the national steering group, which was held on 5 November.

English Teaching

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to complete a review of how English is taught in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend intends to appoint a high-level independent committee to recommend what school pupils should know about the English language. He hopes to announce the committee's composition and terms of reference shortly, and will look to it for an early report.

Marian and Bishop Challoner Schools

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to give approval for an eight-form-entry school resulting from the amalgamation of the Marian high school and Bishop Challoner schools.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is considering the proposal and expects to announce his decision soon.

School Meals

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by education authority (a) the most recently available number of school pupils receiving free school meals, (b) the numbers receiving free school meals as a percentage of the school population, (c) the average number of pupils receiving free school meals during the academic year 1978-79 and (d) the average numbers receiving free school meals expressed as a percentage of the average school population during the academic year 1978-79.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Maltby School

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish Her Majesty's Inspectorate report on Maltby comprehensive school.

Mrs. Rumbold: The report will be published in early 1987.

Open University

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional grant the Open university will receive over the next financial years.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am pleased to announced that the Open university will receive an additional £4·8 million in grant over the financial years 1987-88 to 1989-90. The university already plans to admit an extra 1,500 students on to its undergraduate programme in 1987. It will now be able to offer places to a further 2,000 students in 1988, which will raise the annual intake from 22,000 to 24,000. This will mean that an extra 6,000 students will be offered a place between 1988 and 1990. Two thirds of these additional students will take mathematics, science and technology courses.

About £1·5 million of the money will be used to give further support to mathematics, physics and technology teaching in schools. This will include the development of in-service training packages for physics teachers, and other activities.

In reaching my decision I received the advice of the Open university visiting committee, a copy of whose report has been placed in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Export Rebates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current export rebates which are available to exporters who purchase beef and butter under regulations 2670/85, 765/86 and 1182/86; and if he will set out these export rebates in terms of pence per pound weight in respect of the various items set out in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 545.

Mr. Gummer: Rates of export refund payable on exports of beef from the European Community are fixed according to the cut of beef, the export destination and whether the beef is fresh/chilled, or frozen. Beef is sold from intervention in frozen form; the current rates of export refund are set out in Commission regulation EEC(No.)3125/86, published in Official Journal No. L 291 of 15 October 1986. Traders purchasing beef under this sale may export to any destination for which export refunds are available. All sales to date under this regulation have been for export to European third countries and current rates of refund for the range of beef cuts to these destinations are as follows:

	Export refund (ecu/tonne)	Export refund (pence/lb)
Bone-in beef
Forequarters	740	21
Hindquarters	1,250	36
Boneless beef
Higher value cuts eligible for export refunds	935	27
Lower value cuts eligible for export refund	935	27
Lower value cuts not eligible for refund	—	—

The current provisions of this sale are such that purchases of bone-in beef must comprise equal numbers of forequarters and hindquarters and those of boneless beef must comprise fixed proportions of higher and lower value cuts, some of which do not attract export refunds.

Regulation 1812/86

Traders purchasing beef under this sale must export to Brazil. Refunds are not available for export to this destination.

Regulation 765/86

The current export refunds for butter sold under regulation 765/86 are as follows:

Butter with a fat content of 80 per cent.: 50p per lb.

Butter with a fat content of 82 per cent.: 51p per lb.

Note: The export refund rates above are the common ones. The monetary compensatory amount to be applied will vary according to the member state from which the produce is exported.

Radioactivity

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture Fisheries and Food (1) of the measurements taken of the radioactivity levels in sheep and cattle thyroids on 14 and 21 June, what was the highest level of radioactivity measured; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he intends to publish the full details of measurements made on 14 and 21 June of radioactivity levels in sheep and cattle thyroids.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I assume the hon. Member is referring to levels of short-lived radioiodine found in samples of sheep and cattle thyroids taken on 14 and 21 May. The results of testing were published in the data issued by my Department on 30 May, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. They show that meat from the same animals contained very low levels of radioiodine and radiocaesium.

Thames Barrier

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he will not provide information to right hon. Members and hon. Members regarding outstanding payments in respect of the Thames barrier about which his Deprtment has been kept informed by the London residuary body.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENERGY

British Gas

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the projected budget for the pre-sale publicity costs of British Gas.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) on 5 November at column 471.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a table showing, for each licensed nuclear power station that started operating before 1970 (a) the date each reactor started operating, (b) the date each reactor attained, or is expected to attain 20 years operating life, (c) the date the nuclear installtions inspectorate started, or expects to start, work on the 20 year safety review; (d) the date the nuclear installations inspectorate expects to finish work on the 20 year safety review and (e) the date the nuclear installations inspectorate expects to publish a summary of the 20 year safety review.

Mr. Goodlad: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress made by the nuclear installations inspectorate in completing the 20-year safe review of (a) Bradwell and (b) Berkeley nuclear power stations, indenitfying which technical areas of the safety case for each station have not been agreed with the licensee.

Mr. Goodlad: Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate expects to complete its programe of work on the CEGB's long-term review of Bradwell in the early part of next year, with Berkeley following a few months later.

BNFL (Industrial Accidents)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people have received compensation as a lump sum or ex-gratia payment from British Nuclear Fuels plc in respect of a claim made for damages arising out of an industrial accident or industrial disease at work, including those payments made without admission of liability.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a matter for the management of BNFL. I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Nuclear Power Stations (Simulators)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish information available to him on the simulator equipment used in training managers and staff of nuclear power stations, giving (a) the name and location of each simulator, (b) the date when the simulator became operational for training purposes, (c) the cost of the simulator, (d) to what extent the simulator reflects the reactors, boilers and turbines of the relevant power station, (e) the accuracy of the model of reactor behaviour and (f) the range of faults on reactor, boiler and turbine equipment that can be realistically represented on the simulator.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a matter for the generating boards. I have asked the chairmen of the Central Electricity Generating Board and of British Nuclear Fuels to write to the hon. Member.

Research and Development

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the 1983-84 expenditure on government research and development budgets of the member countries of the International Energy Agency in United States dollars.

Mr. David Hunt: The International Energy Agency publishes statistics on Government expenditure on energy research development and demonstration for calendar years. The figures for 1984 are as follows:

Power Stations (Senior Staff)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list for each year since 1979 the number of persons notified to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate by (a) the Central Electricity Generating Board and (b) the South of Scotland electricity board as power station operators, supervisors and managers, and the number of individual appointments prevented by the inspectorate in each year;

(2) if he will describe the duties of persons notified to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate as power station operators, supervisors and managers, specifying which duties of operators and supervisors are not located within the main control room of a power station; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will describe the responsibilities of Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate in relation to the training and standards of competence of power station management and staff, specifying which persons at a power station are subject to such responsibilities; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will list for each nuclear power station in England and Wales the current number of persons notified to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate as power station operators, supervisors and managers showing each rank or grade separately.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total expenditure on renewable energy sources in 1985-86; and what were the amounts sent in each of the following categories: (a) wind, (b) wave, (c) geothermal aquifiers, (d) geothermal hot-dry rocks, (e) solar, (f) biomass, (g) tidal and (h) Energy Technology Support Unit Services.

Mr. David Hunt: Expenditure on research, development and demonstration in renewable sources of energy in my Department's programmes in 1985-86 is estimated to have been £15·3 million (including expenditure on wastes as a fuel and passive solar design under the energy efficiency demonstration scheme and £2·1 million contributed by external contractors).

My Department's expenditure in individual technologies is estimated to have beeen as follows:

	1985-86 £ million
Wind	5·4
Wave	0·4
Geothermal Aquifers	0·3
Geothermal Hot Dry Rocks	3·5
Solar	0·7
Biomass	0·8
Tidal	0·1
Energy Technology Support Unit Services	2·0

Gas Prices

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to how much the price of gas to firm contract customers has changed since the end of March 1981, as a percentage and in price per therm.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The price of firm contract gas is negotiated with individual customers by British Gas and is a matter for them.

TRANSPORT

London Coach Terminals (Report)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received London Regional Transport's report on coach terminals in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have now received LRT's report on the final phase of their transportation consultants' study into London coach terminals, which provides a thorough assessment of London's coaching problems. I am arranging for copies of the study to be placed in the Library. LRT and its consultants recommend that a major new coach terminal should be developed at Paddington and the chairman of LRT has indicated in a covering letter that the quickest way forward to achieve this solution would be by way of a parliamentary Bill.

While recognising the strong opposition from the Westminster city council and local residents' groups, the LRT board believes that the local traffic environment can be improved as a result of altered road access to the proposed terminal and controls on coach stopping.

However, in the light of the representations I have received from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North and from the chairman of Westminster council's planning and development committee, I am writing to LRT to say that I have decided that it would not be appropriate to take this matter forward by means of a private Bill in this Session of Parliament, nor am I persuaded that a single hub terminal is necessarily the right solution.

Accordingly, I am considering what would be an appropriate form of inquiry to enable the arguments for a single hub terminal compared with the merits of a number of smaller terminals to be properly aired in public before a decision is taken.

Hatfield Bypass

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the A1 Hatfield bypass to open.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am delighted that the scheme will be opened on 10 December by HRH the Duke of Kent.

Uranium Hexafluoride (Transportation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the safety arrangements for the regular transportation from France, via Newhaven, to BNFL's plant at Springfields, near Preston, of uranium hexafluoride; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Uranium hexafluoride is transported from France to BNF Springfields via Newhaven in accordance with national and international regulations for the safe transport of radioactive materials.

Half-barrier Rail Crossings

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to approve any new automatic half-barrier rail crossings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board has circulated to the appropriate highway and local authorities draft orders for the conversion of 22 level crossings to automatic half-barriers. Providing the proposals conform to the Department's published requirements for such crossings, and subject to consideration of any representations made by the authorities, the orders will be made. Automatic half-barriers have had a good safety record extending over a period of more than 25 years. Automatic half-barrier level-crossings should not be confused with the open level crossings without barriers, which are the subject of the Stott inquiry following the accident at Lockington.

Lockington Rail Accident

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the present timescale for the public inquiry into the Lockington rail accident.

Mr. David Mitchell: The inspecting officer concerned has taken evidence in public and is conducting further investigations. His report should be published in about six months.

Chapter 2 Aircraft

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to phase out chapter 2 aircraft, suitably hushkitted, belonging to British companies; and if he will set out in tabular form his proposed timetable.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No decisions have been taken on the long and expensive process of phasing out chapter 2 aeroplanes, either on United Kingdom or foreign registers. The question of phasing out chapter 2 aeroplanes is a matter which is still under international discussion.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to permit chapter 2 aircraft in British ownership to continue flying in and out of British airports until such time as foreign airlines have to comply with the same noise regulations.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will answer this question shortly.

Night Operations (Heathrow and Gatwick)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to ensure that any proposed changes in night operation rotation at Heathrow and Gatwick will have regard to the most effective use of aircraft, personnel, and airport resources.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We shall, of course, take into account the operational and economic effects of any changes on airports and airlines as well as the needs of people who live near the airports.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he hopes to finalise his night flight policy out of Gatwick and Heathrow for summer 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am presently considering the response to the public consultation which I initiated on 8 May. I expect to consult interested parties before Christmas about proposals for changes in the night restrictions policy, and to announce decisions in time for summer 1987.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what study he is making of proposals in connection with the Channel tunnel with regard to a regional network of inland customs clearance centres at railway marshalling yards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that British Rail is still examining the pattern of inland clearance centres that would be appropriate for dealing with Channel tunnel freight traffic. It will be its responsibility to put forward proposals for consideration in due course.

GLC Road Assessment Unit

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements have been made to safeguard the future of the Greater London council's road assessment unit.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No such arrangements are needed.

London Residuary Body (Property Transfers)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what properties have been and are due to be transferred to his Department from the London residuary body.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This is still under discussion with the London residuary body.

British International Chinook Helicopter Crash (Report)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of the accident investigation branch into the crash of the British International Chinook in the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It will be some time before the accidents investigation branch report on the tragic crash of the British International Helicopters' Chinock on 6 November 1986 is completed. However, today the chief inspector of accidents has published a special bulletin setting out the basic facts of the accident and I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Air safety is the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority, who I understand have been closely involved with the accident investigation which has been studying the transmission gearbox failure sequence and its metallurgy. Whilst the authority is evaluating the possibility of safely returning the aircraft to service, the remaining Chinook helicopters on the United Kingdom civil register will not be flying.

National Traffic Club

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made towards the establishment of a national traffic club for pre-school children.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We invited a number of private organisations to submit proposals for the formation, long-term organisation, financing and promotion of a national traffic club. We are considering the outcome of discussions on the latest proposals with a view to deciding whether any of them provides a sound basis for the establishment of a traffic club on a national scale.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Brent

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what purposes it has been alleged to him that Brent council intends to use the 177 posts under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966; and who made such allegations.

Mr. Waddington: A wide range of allegations have been made about the purposes of these posts. The common thread has been concern that the postholders would be more concerned with the implementation of the council's so-called "anti-racist" policies than with improving the achievement of Commonwealth children in Brent's schools, which was the ground on which section 11 funding was sought and on which approval in principle was given. Following a number of articles in the press, questions have been asked by some hon. Members and a number of individuals have written direct to the Home Office.

Iran

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum from Iranian nationals were received by his Department in each of the past five years; how many were refused; and how many were granted.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is published in tables 1 and 5C to 5F of Home Office statistical bulletin "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom 1985" (issue 12/86).

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many outstanding applications for political asylum from Iranian nationals are currently being considered by his Department.

Mr. Waddington: Provisional information indicates that 1,270 applications for political asylum from Iranians were outstanding on 30 September 1986.

Police Department

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials of the Home Office police department are employed as support for his position as the police authority for London.

Mr. Hurd: Seven officials work on these duties full time, but the police department is organised on a functional basis, and all its officials are available to advise me depending on the matter under consideration. The co-ordination of this advice is under the direction of the head of the police department (grade 2), supported by a grade 3 official for a major part of his time.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions, in each year since 1979, he used his powers to direct the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis under section 1 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1829 for the efficient administration of the police; to what purpose; and to what effect.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Neither my right hon. Friend nor his two immediate predecessors have found it necessary to exercise their powers under section 1 by issuing specific, formal directions to the Commissioner. But the finance and manpower code, which came fully into operation on 1 July this year, contains general provisions about the limits of the Commissioner's delegated authority on certain manpower and personnel matters. Beyond that, there have been regular discussions with the Commissioner of the day in which our views on matters of policing policy have been made clear. Since 1982, the Commissioner has set out his plans for the year ahead in a strategy report, which has required our approval.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Metropolitan police force orders and regulations have been issued in each year since 1979, broken down by month and subject.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of items in the Metropolitan police orders in each month from January 1979 to October 1986 are set out in table A. A complete list of the subjects of the orders is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. For the purposes of illustration, the subjects covered by orders issued in May 1983 are shown in table B.

Witness statements

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the current administrative procedure whereby Metropolitan police force orders and regulations are approved;

(2) what areas are covered by the Metropolitan police force orders and regulations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that police orders are usually issued twice weekly. They are approved by the senior police officers responsible for the items included in the orders which cover a wide range of subjects concerned with the management of the force and policing practices. Standing orders for the force are contained in general orders and regulations, which deal with administration, finance and supplies, crime, prisoners, courts, traffic, public transport, technical services and other police duties. Amendments to the standing orders are approved by the police department of the Home Office on my behalf under section 5 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1829. Such amendments are promulgated in police orders.

Rutland District Council (Correspondence)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the director of works at the Home Office intends to reply to the letters dated 21 January, 18 March, 17 July and 7 November from the Rutland district council regarding the Cornish unit dwelling which comprised the former prison officers' quarters at Her Majesty's prison, Ashwell; and whether he will instruct that that matter be dealth with immediately.

Mr. Mellor: We regret the delay in replying to the earlier letters. The queries in them were answered orally at a meeting between the Home Office chief estate officer and the chief executive of the Rutland district council on 3 September 1986. Written confirmation was not requested by the council at that meeting but has now been provided in response to the council's letter of 7 November.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much of the £4·1 million due to the London residuary body has been paid.

Mr. Hurd: None. The £4·1 million is an estimate; we await the London residuary body's grant claims.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Winson Green prison on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: Three hundred and eighty.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Winson Green prison; how many baths or showers each prisoner is allowed each week; and how many changes of underclothes and outer clothes each prisoner is allowed each week.

Mr. Mellor: The number of baths, showers and toilets available are as follows:

	Number
Baths	38
Showers	63
WCs	126
Urinals	89

Each prisoner is normally allowed one shower per week and an additional shower when he makes use of the gymnasium. Additional showers are available for prisoners employed in jobs of a physically dirty nature and on return from court appearances.

When appropriate for medical reasons, a bath is available instead of a shower.

Prisoners at Birmingham have one change of clothes per week consisting of one shirt, two T-shirts, two pairs of socks, two pairs of underpants, two vests. Overclothing is changed as necessary, but on return from court prisoners receive a full kit of clean cloths.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many square feet of exercise space are available to prisoners in Winson Green prison.

Mr. Mellor: Forty six thousand square feet in exercise yards and 8,500 sq ft in the gymnasium.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many hours each day, and for what length of time, prisoners are allowed to make use of outside exercise space at Winson Green prison.

Mr. Mellor: The various exercise yards are in use for two to three hours a day and all prisoners who wish have up to an hours exercise each day. In addition each prisoner is allowed to use the gymnasium once a week if he wishes.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Winson Green prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; how many classes took place and for how many hours; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during that week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the workshops were open for 17 hours; an average of 369 prisoners were employed in workshops and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 72 education classes (45 day-time and 27 evening) took place for a total of 144 hours; there were an average of eight prisoners in each class; in addition, a total of 720 prisoners attended physical education classes during the course of the week. It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, association, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out-of-cell activities.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Winson Green prison, Birmingham, in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are only collected centrally once a week. On 14 November, 1986 HM prison Birmingham held 1,085 prisoners.

BBC (Chairman and Governors)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names of the chairman and governors of the BBC; and how long each has served.

Mr. Mellor: The details are contained in the following table.

BBC Governors

Prisoners (Letters)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's policy regarding prisoners at Her Majesty's prisons receiving letters and printed material in languages other than English; and whether the policy varies from one prison to another.

Mr. Mellor: Subject to the normal rules governing the receipt of letters and printed material by prisoners, there is no restriction on the receipt of these items in languages other than English. However, the prison authorities are entitled to satisfy themselves that correspondence and printed material received by prisoners do not contain matter which contravenes prison regulations, and it may therefore be necessa ' delay passing a letter or printed matter in a language ther than English to its recipient until it can be scruntin ed in translation or by an officer familiar with the language in question.

Victims of Crime

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what Government funding is to be provided for the next 12 months to organisations aiding the victims of crime.

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government measures to assist the victim support movement.

Mr. Mellor: During the current financial year, 1986-87, the Home Office is providing a grant of £150,000 to the National Association of Victims Supports Schemes, together with £136,000 to assist local schemes which are experiencing financial difficulties. In 1987-88, as well as renewing the grant to NAVSS, the Home Office intends to make £2 million available in further support for local schemes, as the first stage in a new programme of funding totalling £9 million over three years. The primary purpose of this funding is to support full-time, salaried co-ordinators. Many victims support groups, like other voluntary organisations, also receive assistance under a variety of general central Government programmes, in particular the urban programme and the MSC voluntary projects and community programmes.

Heysel Stadium Disaster

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston can expect to receive a reply to his letter of 6 October relating to extradition proceedings following the Heysel stadium disaster.

Mr. Mellor: I am writing to the hon. Member today.

THE ARTS

Arts Council

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will announce funding for the Arts Council in 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I am able now to announce many of the details of the arts budget for 1987-88.

The central Government arts budget for 1987-88 has been set at £339 million, an increase of £17 million and about 5·5 per cent. Subject to parliamentary approval of the Supply Estimates, I propose that the allocations to specific institutions and schemes shall be as follows.

Rather more than half of the overall increase in the central Government programme is for the British library's major building project. But there will also be increased spending in a number of other areas. I am also pleased to announce a new marketing initiative which will complement the present very successful business sponsorship incentive scheme.

The recurrent grant to the British library will be increased to £51 million in 1987-88, and includes £600,000 for the Corn Stores building project in Boston Spa. Provision of £18·6 million is being made for continued expenditure on the construction of the Library's new St. Pancras building, and on the Library's existing accommodation.

The Arts Council grant will be increased to £138·4 million. The basic provision will be £113·8 million, together with a continuation of the special provision of £0·6 million for Scotland. This represents an increase of £3·8 million (3·4 per cent.) over the current year figure. Post-abolition funding will be increased from the planned level of £21 million to £24 million (and from £20 million to £23 million in 1988-89).

A sum of £ 0·25 million is being made available for a new arts marketing scheme to be run by the Office of Arts and Libraries. Arts bodies, museums and libraries in receipt of public funds will be invited to submit entries to a competition for awards for new marketing initiatives. The scheme will be launched on 1 January 1987, and I shall be announcing further details next month. The business sponsorship incentive scheme will continue with provision of £1·75 million for awards in the coming year, the same amount as in 1986-87.

The grant to the British Film Institute next year will be £10·03 million. I am increasing the supplement given last year to match funding from other sources for film production. Post-abolition funding will be £1·3 million, the same as in 1986-87.

The National Film and Television School's grant will be £1·127 million: baseline funding of £1·071 million and £56,000 for improvements to the school's buildings.

The grant to the Crafts Council, at £2·022 million, will be £97,000 higher than the current year's provision.

The National Heritage Memorial Fund will receive £3 million next year, jointly from the Office of Arts and Libraries and the Department of the Environment. The fund has also received substantial additional funding from the Department of the Environment in recent years.

Basic provision for acceptances in lieu of tax will be maintained at £2 million, jointly from the Office of Arts and Libraries and Department of the Environment. The arrangements for possible calls on the Reserve of up to £10 million per annum, announced by my predecessor on 26 July 1985, remain in force.

The 1987-88 provision for the public lending right will be £2·75 million, the same as in the current year.

Overall provision for museums and galleries will rise by £3·896 million, an increase of 3·8 per cent. over the present year. The individual allocations in this part of the arts programme will be announced in due course. They will cover the running costs, purchase grants and building programme of the national museums and galleries and the grants to the Greater Manchester museum of science and industry and the Museums and Galleries Commission.

WALES

National Tree Week

11. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives his Department is taking to promote National Tree Week from 29 November to 7 December.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I fully support the measures taken by the Tree Council to promote the planting and maintenance of amenity trees and I wish the National Tree Week every success. A variety of assistance is available to encourage planting in Wales including grant under the urban programme, farm capital grant schemes, the broadleaves woodland grant scheme and assistance from the Countryside Commission. We also have a particularly encouraging Welsh initiative in the Coed Cymru campaign.

Barry (Employment Opportunities)

13. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that current efforts by local authorities, industrialists and other bodies to create new employment and job opportunities in Barry and district shall enjoy the fullest support of his Department, of the Welsh Development Agency and all other government offices in Wales; and if he will consider what extra incentives and assistance may be introduced.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department and the Welsh Development Agency have sought and will continue to seek to support all sound proposals for creating new employment in the Barry and district area. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have welcomed the announcement this morning that a new holiday airline, Inter European Airways, is being set up in his constituency. This project is supported by regional selective assistance and will provide 145 new jobs.

Rented Housing (Finance)

14. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the contribution of free enterprise sector finance to the provision of housing for rent.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I welcome the scheme recently announced for St. Mellons, Cardiff which was devised jointly by the Welsh Office, Cardiff city council and the housing associations involved. It is the first project of its kind which has involved provision of land by the City Council and the use of a limited cash grant from the Housing Corporation to trigger private sector finance from the building societies.

Primary Schools

15. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Wales in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure for 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1984-85, the amount spent per pupil in primary schools in Wales was £774. Using the GDP deflator, the equivalent figure for 1978-79 was £686.

Collieries (Mid Glamorgan)

16. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had any recent discussions with the chairman of British Coal concerning the future of collieries in Mid Glamorgan.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have regular discussions with the chairman of British Coal about a wide range of issues relating to the coal industry in Wales.

School Leavers

17. Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many school leavers there were in Wales at the end of the summer term; how many found employment by the end of October, or at the latest date for which the information is available; and if he will give the information for the corresponding period in 1978.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not yet available. However, the Government have given an undertaking that all those school leavers without jobs and eligible for two-year YTS should be offered a place by Christmas.

Welsh Development Agency

19. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the budget of the Welsh Development Agency for 1987-88.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency's budget for 1987-88 is still being considered and discussions will be taking place with the agency on the level and pattern of resources for the year.

Mid Glamorgan (Financial Assistance)

20. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales from which European Economic Community schemes, funds and bodies Mid Glamorgan presently benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Mid Glamorgan is able to benefit from the European regional development fund, European Coal and Steel Community resources, the European investment bank, the European social fund and the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to introduce city technology colleges in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have no immediate plans to do so but I shall but watching the pilot scheme carefully and, if it is successful and there is a demand from parents, I shall be ready to consider proposals for an analogous initiative in Wales.

Dairy Products (France)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the balance of imports and exports between France and Wales of dairy products over the past six years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is not available.

Government-sponsored Bodies (Wales)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales on what date he will be in a position to announce what funds will be made available to (a) the Wales tourist board and (b) other Government-sponsored bodies in Wales for the financial year 1987-88.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Details of the funds to be made available to the Wales tourist board and to other Government-sponsored bodies in Wales for the financial year 1987-88 will be contained in the Supply Estimates, usually published in March.

Teachers (Pilot Schemes)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to fund bids for appraisal of teachers' pilot schemes in Wales; which local education authoritie's in Wales made bids; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No, and this was made clear in Welsh Office circular 33/86 issued in July. Subsequently, Dyfed and Clwyd education authorities have made bids for funds under the mistaken assumption that a letter from the Association of County Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, inviting local education authorities to participate in a pilot scheme for teacher appraisal, applied to Wales.

Teachers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received to increase the numbers of teachers in Welsh schools; and if he proposes to make available funds to enable Welsh local education authorities to increase the numbers of classroom teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Local education authorities have drawn attention to the implication for the staffing of schools of the Government's policies to improve the quality of education. Against the background of rapidly falling pupil numbers, the Government's expenditure plans assume that authorities will further reduce the number of teachers they employ, but that the overall pupil teacher ratio, currently at its best ever level, will continue to improve.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of teacher shortages in schools in Wales in the following subjects: mathematics, various sciences, crafts, art, design and technology.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The best available measure of teacher shortages in Wales in mathematics, science subjects, crafts, art, design and technology is given in table 20 of the Welsh Education Statistics Bulletin: No. 1 1986 — "Secondary School Staffing Survey". The following information taken from that table shows the percentage of periods taught by teachers with and without qualifications in each of the relevanat subjects.

Education (Resources)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received (a) from teaching unions and (b) from other sources on the provision of (i) books, (ii) equipment and (iii) school buildings in Wales; what extra resources he will make available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Representations about such matters have been received from teachers' unions and others. Additional resources of £1·2 million in 1986-87, specifically for GCSE books and equipment were announced in June. Further announcements about the 1987-88 service distribution of current expenditure and capital allocations to local authorities will be made in due course.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has received representations regarding (a) resources for higher education in Wales and (b) future funding by the University Grants Committee; and if he will make a statement concerning the difficulties encountered by the University College of Wales and by the University College of North Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have received a number of representations regarding resources for the university of Wales and its constituent colleges. Resources for the university sector in Great Britain and the distribution of grant to individual institutions is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the University Grants Committee. My right hon. Friend recently announced an increase of £95 million for university recurrent grant in 1987-88. We are aware that the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth and the University College of North Wales, Bangor are reviewing their academic provision in the light of the resources available to them. We hope that the additional resources now being made available to the university sector will enable the rationalisation plans in the university of Wales and its constituent colleges to be completed successfully.

GCSE

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the current level of progress in Wales regarding the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Yes.

School Governing Bodies

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to seek to change the constitution of school governing bodies in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Yes. Our policies are contained in the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 which received Royal Assent on 7 November.

Hypothermia

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of deaths from hypothermia-related causes in Wales in each of the months of 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of deaths of persons usually resident in Wales where hypothermia was mentioned on the death certificate (whether or not it was recorded as the underlying cause) are given in the following table:

Month of registration	1984	1985	[1] 1986

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total number of people out of work in (a) Wales and (b) Alyn and Deeside for the last year for which figures are available; and what proportion of these are (i) under 25 years old, (ii) 25 to 40 years old and (iii) 41 to 60 years old.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Numbers of unemployed claimants at October 1986 for Wales and Alyn and Deeside are given in the following table. The precise age bands requested are not available.

Claimant's Age	Wales	Alyn and Deeside
	per cent.	per cent.
Under 25 years	36·7	35·0
25-39 years	33·3	32·9
40-59 years	28·3	30·1
All ages	174,105	4,034

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales have been out of work for (a) less than six months, (b) six months to a year, (c) one to two years and (d) over two years and (e) over five years; and what measures he has to assist the long-term unemployed to find work in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The numbers of people in Wales who have been unemployed for the duration requested are given in the following table. The data relate to October 1986.

Duration of unemployment
Up to six months	72,424
Over six months to one year	28,638
Over one year to two years	26,208
Over two years	46,835
Over five years[1]	14,897

[1] "Over five years" are also included in the "over two years" Category.

The Government's specific and comprehensive programme of measures to help the long-term unemployed is focused on the restart programme and includes the community programme, the voluntary projects programme, the enterprise allowance scheme, as well as job-clubs and training course. All these have a proven record in helping people back into work.

General Hospitals

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has made any recent reappraisal of general hospital needs in Gwent and Mid Glamorgan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The determination of general hospital needs is a matter for the respective district health authorities. They have recently carried out appraisals in order to prepare their strategic plans for the development of health services within their districts.

Cardiff Airport (Road)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with South Glamorgan county council on the need for improvement of the main road between Cardiff and the Cardiff/Wales airport at Rhoose; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. This is a matter for the local highway authority.

Food (Radioactivity)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to publish full details of the measurements of radioactivity in foodstuffs distributed by his Department on 23 July.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: We are continuing to publish the results of monitoring radioactivity in foodstuffs as soon as practicable. Copies of all publications are placed in the Library. I am not clear what particular data the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

MSC Schemes

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the people employed on Manpower Services Commission schemes in Wales work on schemes for agencies based in England; and what proportion of the total employed on such schemes they represent.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Barmouth Harbour

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what byelaws are currently in force governing the use of Barmouth harbour; and whether he has any plans to bring any others into force.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There are no byelaws currently in force at Barmouth harbour. New byelaws were however confirmed on 14 November 1986 and are due to come into operation one month from that date.

Free School Meals

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by education authority (a) the most recently available number of school pupils receiving free school meals, (b) the numbers receiving free school meals as a percentage of the school population, (c) the average number of pupils receiving free school meals during the academic year 1978-79 and (d) the average numbers receiving free school meals expressed as a percentage of the average school population during the academic year 1978-79.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The available information is given in the following table.

	1978-79		1984-85
	Number of pupils in maintained schools receiving free school meals[2]	Percentage of school population[1]	Number of pupils in maintained schools receiving free school meals[2]	Percentage of school population[1]

Mid-Glamorgan	15,437	13·9	25,271	25·9
Powys	2,781	13·6	2,530	13·2
South Glamorgan	12,132	16·7	12,306	19·5
West Glamorgan	9,080	13·1	12,578	21·6

[1] School population is at January each year.
[2] Data on school meals is obtained from a census carried out on a specified day in autumn each year, therefore average numbers are not available.

Breast Screening

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales what facilities exist within the National Health Service in Wales for a breast screening service based upon mammography; what estimates have been made of the cost of extending this facility; and how many centres would be necessary to ensure that the service was available throughout Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Facilities for mass population screening for breast cancer are not available in Wales at the present time. The United Kingdom expert working group on breast cancer screening under the chairmanship of Sir Patrick Forrest in its interim report (a copy of which is in the Library) established a prima facie clinical case for breast cancer screening. The group has been working up detailed policy options taking account of the benefits and costs and the implications for the NHS of implementing such options. These are expected shortly and our Department will consider the needs of Wales in the light of the group's conclusions.

Welsh Coal (Transportation)

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation his Department has had about British Coal's policy of concentrating the sale of Welsh coal to Ireland through a single port; whether there has been any discussion of financial incentives from British Coal to encourage investment in facilities at a single port site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There have been no such consultations or discussions with my Department. These are commercial matters for British Coal.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales have been unemployed for five years or more; what proportion of the total unemployed these people constitute; and what proportion they constituted in November (a) 1985, (b) 1984, (c) 1983 and (d) 1982.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In October 1986 there were 14,897 claimants in Wales who had been unemployed for over five years. The proportion which this represents of the total unemployed is given in the table below, along with percentages for previous years. The figures are produced quarterly and have been given for October in each year, the nearest month available to that requested. The "over five years" duration analysis was not carried out in 1982.

Unemployed over 5 years as a per cent. of the total

Year (at October)	per cent.
1984	3·8

The figures may be slightly affected by the change in compilation in March 1986, which involved delaying the count of unemployed claimants each month by two weeks to avoid over-recording.

Mr. Tebbit: I am responsible for the administration of the affairs of the Duchy of Lancaster and I serve as a member of Cabinet.

Official Responsibilities

32. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what matters within his official responsibilities he does not propose to answer questions in this House.

Mr. Tebbit: It is not possible to produce a definitive list of questions which I might decline to answer, except on grounds of cost. However, I would not normally expect to answer questions which relate to confidential matters between the Duchy and its tenants, or those with whom it has dealings. I do not propose to answer detailed questions concerning my future engagements. Nor will I answer questions on that part of my official responsibilities which involves participation in the collective ministerial consideration of matters for which another Minister answers to Parliament.

Ministerial Office Accommodation

Mr. Dixon asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what office accommodation is available to him as Chancellor of the Duchy; and whether it is equipped with television or video recording apparatus.

Mr. Tebbit: I have the use of two rooms and a lobby in the Cabinet Office; they are equipped with both a television and a video recorder.

ENVIRONMENT

Meetings with Members

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions since 1979 a Minister in his Department has refused to meet an hon. Member or a right hon. Member concerning a constituency matter.

Mr. Ridley: This information is not available.

Mr. Chope: No.

Middleton Estate, Leeds

Mr. Merlyn Rees asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he received from owner-occupiers of duo properties on the Middleton estate in Leeds 10; whether in the light of those representations, he will give permission to the Leeds city council to repurchase these homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: My Department received two letters from owners, both endorsing the Government's earlier decision not to designate Duo Slab houses nationally under the housing defects legislation. Having considered the matter carefully, we are now able to agree Leeds city council's request for sanction for repurchase at all four Duo Slab estates. My officers will be writing to the council shortly, to confirm the details.

"Combating Cold Homes"

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to the letter of 18 July from the right hon. Member for Brent East enclosing a copy of a paper entitled "Combating Cold Homes".

Mr. Ridley: The right hon. Member will by now have received my reply of 13 November which was sent also on behalf of my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Energy and Health and Social Services.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department is kept advised of the total value of property disposed of by the London residuary body; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The London residuary body will be providing statistical returns of its receipts from the sale of fixed assets.

Mr Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice has been issued by his Department to the London residuary body concerning responsibility for rights and liabilities in respect of the Thames barrier.

Mr. Chope: My Department issued general guidance on property, rights and liabilities to all successor bodies on 7 August. The hon. Member has a copy. Under article 20 of the Local Government Reorganisation (Property etc.) Order 1986 (SI 1986 No. 148) all property relating to the Thames barrier is vested in the Thames water authority. Responsibility for rights and liabilities in respect of the barrier is a matter for resolution betwen the authority and the London residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the extent of the London residuary body's industrial and commercial portfolio inherited from the Greater London council; and if he has been consulted about its disposal.

Mr. Chope: I understand that the London residuary body is currently reviewing options for the disposal of the extensive industrial and commercial portfolio which it inherited from the Greater London council. I do not have precise information about the extent of the portfolio.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now give his current estimate of the number of ex-Greater London council staff who have still not received full payment of outstanding claims against the London residuary body.

Mr. Chope: This is a matter for the London residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how much has been distributed by the London residuary body to the London boroughs since 1 April 1986;

(2) what information he has on the distribution of Greater London council balances to the London boroughs by the London residuary body since 1 April 1986.

Mr. Chope: The London residuary body is distributing to boroughs the GLC's "top-end estimate" of £134 million, net of £45 million which is being used to pay staff compensation and other costs. The timing and method of this distribution is a matter for the London residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue a direction to the London residuary body to ensure the speedy payment of detriment to former Greater London council staff.

Mr. Chope: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made a decision regarding the borrowing requirements of the London residuary body for 1986-87; and if he will give details of the representations he has received.

Mr. Chope: It seems likely that the LRB will be able to finance its 1986-87 capital programme without incurring long-term debt liabilities. I have received no recent representations on the subject of LRB borrowing in 1986-87.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to receive the final formal submission of the accounts of the London residuary body for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will issue a direction to the London residuary body to allow for inspection of its accounts by London ratepayers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has recently received the formal submission of all the residuary bodies' 1985-86 statements of accounts. These will be laid before Parliament shortly and, as provided for in section 79(6) of the Local Government Act 1985, published immediately thereafter by the residuary bodies. The draft 1985-86 accounts of the London residuary body were made available for public inspection from 4 to 24 September, inclusive, having been so advertised in the London Standard and Daily Telegraph on 19 August.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the former Greater London council's services are still the subject of discussions between his Department and the London residuary body.

Mr. Chope: The LRB keeps my Department informed from time to time on progress on such services as the research and intelligence unit, the scientific services, the computing service and the welfare benefits service.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an indicative figure of meetings between (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department with the London residuary body since 12 June.

Mr. Chope: Since 12 June last, there have been nine formal meetings between Ministers of this Department and members of the London residuary body and approximately 30 meetings between officials of the Department and those of the London residuary body.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to implement the regulations covered by European Community directive 84/631/EEC of 6 December 1984 concerning the supervision and control within European countries of the trans-frontier shipment of hazardous waste; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am unable to lay the regulations required to implement the directive until amendments to the consignment notes used in this system of control have been agreed in Brussels. These amendments are necessary to make the consignment notes consistent with new procedures adopted in directive 86/279/EEC. There are also a number of technical difficulties still to be resolved.

County Hall, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects an announcement to be made about the future of county hall, London.

Mr. Chope: This is a matter for the London residuary body.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what specific matters caused his Department to revise the draft guidance to residuary bodies on property and financial rights and liabilities.

Mr. Chope: The final guidance took full account of the views expressed by residuary bodies and successor authorities on the consultation draft.

Hampstead Heath

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet received the London residuary body's recommendations regarding the future of Hampstead Heath.

Mr. Chope: No.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce a decision on the future of Hampstead Heath; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: A decision will be announced following receipt of the London residuary body's recommendations which are unlikely to be made before the end of this calendar year.

Thamesmead

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current state of negotiations between the London residuary body and Thamesmead town in respect of the transfer of Thamesmead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Both parties are working towards a transfer date of 1 January 1987 and are now discussing detailed arrangements.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest assessment of the cost or saving per household in Greater London arising from the abolition of the Greater London council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Savings from abolition are at present measurable in terms of reductions of posts. Information on manpower and redundancies is currently being received and analysed. My right hon. Friend hopes to make a statement in due course.

Seaside and Country Homes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current state of negotiation with Anchor Housing Association in respect of the Greater London Council's seaside and country homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I understand that there have recently been two meetings between the parties.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has anything to add to the figures in his Department's "Report on the Inquiry into the Condition of the Local Authority Housing Stock in England, 1985", published November 1985.

Mr. John Patten: No. The inquiry report contained a comprehensive analysis, based on all the material we received.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authority dwellings have been demolished since 1979; and how many of these had outstanding debt of less than 20 years, between 20 and 40 years and greater than 40 years.

Mr. John Patten: Statistical returns to my Department of dwelling demolitions do not separately identify those which were constructed for local authorities nor is information available on the debts outstanding on any of these dwellings which have been demolished.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the value by historic cost and market price, of the local authority housing stock sold since 1979 (a) under right to buy legislation, (b) sales to sitting tenants and (c) sales of vacant dwellings, giving the cost of discounts off the sale price in each case;

(2) what is the total local authority housing stock sold since 1979, giving a breakdown of sales (a) under right-to-buy legislation (b) other sales to sitting tenants and (c) sales of vacant dwellings, listing how many in each category were (i) houses, (ii) flats, (iii) maisonettes, (iv) bungalows and (v) others.

Mr. John Patten: I will answer these questions shortly.

Norman Shaw North Building

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which organisation is to occupy the building under construction at the rear of Norman Shaw North; and what is the completion date and the estimated construction and fitting-out costs.

Mr. Chope: The development behind Norman Shaw North comprises a new building on Richmond yard linked to the restoration of the Georgian Richmond terrace; and the refurbishment of adjacent buildings fronting Parliament street.

Some of the development will be occupied by the Cabinet Office and the Welsh Office; but the majority of the space will be used for the ODA.

The building is on programme to be ready for occupation in the autumn 1987. The current estimate of cost of construction and fitting-out is £36 million.

Land Register

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set up a register of vacant and unused land owned by nationalised industries, health authorities, water authorities and other statutory bodies.

Mr. John Patten: The registers of publicly owned unused and underused land maintained by my right hon. Friend under part X of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 include such land owned by nationalised industries, health authorities, water authorities and the other statutory bodies listed in schedule 16 to the Act.

Homelessness

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes any penalty on those local housing authorities which refuse to submit homelessness figures to his Department on the regular quarterly basis.

Mr. John Patten: We have at present no plans to make homelessness returns compulsory. We are, however, considering what other steps might be taken to improve the response by authorities.

Housing Programme

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the net provision for the total housing programme in 1987-88 compares with the expected outturn for 1986-87; and if he will show the difference in (a) cost and (b) real terms.

Mr. John Patten: The net housing programme total for 1987-88 is £3,204 million. This is £356 million higher than expected outturn for 1986-87 and represents an increase of 12·5 per cent. in cash terms and 8·4 per cent. in real terms.

Urban Regeneration

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications have been received for urban regeneration grants; what is the total value; and how many he expects to approve in the current financial year.

Mr. John Patten: Part III of the Housing Planning Act 1986, which will be the authority for the payment of urban regeneration grant, has not yet been brought into force. I cannot predict the flow of applications and approvals. Provision for preliminary expenditure in the current financial year has been made in section D of Vote X, 3.

Housing Staff College

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has decided his policy towards the proposal by the Audit Commission in the report, "Managing the Crisis in Council Housing", for a housing staff college.

Mr. John Patten: I will answer this question shortly.

Inner City Partnerships

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for the inner city partnership authorities the variation from the 1985-86 budget, outlining reasons for any underspends.

Mr. John Patten: The figures requested are:

£ million

Partnership	Allocation[1]	Provisional outturn

The local authorities are responsible for managing expenditure on approved projects so as to use fully the allocation provided.

Spectrum Arena, Warrington

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the sale of Spectrum Arena, Birchwood, Warrington to be completed; and to whom it is being sold.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from Warrington and Runcorn development corporation that an offer has been accepted, subject to contract, from CPW Leisure Limited of Birmingham. It is not possible to say at present when the sale will be completed.

Local Taxes

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish a table showing in terms of pounds per week the average gross local tax bill under (a) rates and (b) the proposed community charge for households in Great Britain classified by ranges of household net income per adult household member;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the average net local tax bill after rebates as a percentage of net income under (a) rates and (b) the proposed community charge for households in Great Britain classified by ranges of household net income per adult household member;

(3) if he will publish a table showing in terms of pounds per week the average net local tax bill after rebate under

(a) rates and (b) the proposed community charge for households in Great Britain classified by ranges of household net income per adult household member;

(4) if he will publish a table showing the average gross local tax bill as a percentage of net income under (a) rates and (b) the proposed community charge for households in Great Britain classified by ranges of household net income per adult household member.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Gentleman to table F5 on page 106 of "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714). This gives the information required for both bands of household income and equivalent household income.

Sulphur Dioxide

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the most recent figures available for sulphur dioxide emissions, in million tons, from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, Italy, East Germany, West Germany and France.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Spain

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Spanish Government about the dispatch of Spanish warships to the South Atlantic.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Falklands Fisheries

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice Her Majesty's Government have offered to the Falkland Islands Government concerning policy on and the mechanics of (i) the inspection and (ii) the boarding of fishing vessels operating or fishing inside the fisheries conservation zone; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food officials have visited the Falklands to advise on the establishment of the new interim conservation and management regime, and experienced officers of the Ministry's sea fisheries inspectorate will conduct normal at-sea enforcement procedures.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with representatives of the Spanish Government about vessels fishing within the 150-mile Falklands conservation zone; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's ambassador in Madrid is in touch with the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs about the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether, during the course of discussions with the Soviet Union over the last six months on the subject of the South Atlantic fisheries, the Soviet Union objected to the imposition of the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone;

(2) whether he has received any response from the Soviet Government or its representatives in London on the question of Her Majesty's Government's establishment of the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone:

(3) whether he expects any difficulties with the Soviet Union or other East European countries to arise following upon his decision to establish the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone.

Mr. Eggar: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 7 November at column 648.

Akram Harnubya

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the issue of the deportation of Akram Harnubyá with the Israeli Foreign Minister.

Mr. Renton: We have expressed concern to the Israeli authorities both here and in Israel about the proposal to deport Mr. Akram Haniyya.

Portugal

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what consideration Her Majesty's Goverment have given to the relevance of the Portuguese application for membership of Western European Union to continued Portuguese membership of the European Community;

(2) what consideration Her Majesty's Government have given to the relevance of the Portuguese application for membership of Western European Union to continued Portuguese participation in the North Atlantinc Treaty Organisation;

(3) what obstacles remain to acceptance of the Portuguese application for membership of Western European Union made in 1984 in Rome.

Mr. Eggar: The seven member Governments of the Western European Union have agreed that possible enlargement of the WEU would require completion of the reactivation process. This will be reviewed at the end of 1987. They have agreed also that it will be necessary to examine in depth the political conditions and legal implications of accession, in particular the applicability to new members of all the provisions of the modified Brussels Treaty and its additional Protocols. This remains the position. It is, of course, for the Portuguese Government to consider the relationship between their membership of NATO and of the European Community and their application to join the WEU.

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the implications for Western defence of the continuance of the Anglo-Portuguese treaty of 1386.

Mr. Eggar: The treaty, the 600th anniversary of which we celebrate this year, lies at the heart of our excellent relations with Portugal. The close identity of outlook to which the treaty contributes makes it natural that Portugal and the United Kingdom were among the co-founders of NATO. We have always collaborated closely within the Atlantic Alliance and will naturally continue to do so.

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that all the recommendations for improved security at Government communications headquarters following the Prime case have been implemented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: All recommendations made in the report of the Security Commission on the Prime case (Cmnd. 8876) were accepted by the Government and are now at varying stages of implementation. The Director of Government communications headquarters is pursuing the recommendations which were addressed to that organisation.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide an assessment of the impact of the Anglo-Irish Agreement on attitudes in the Republic of Ireland.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is not appropriate in such circumstances to provide a public assessment of this kind.

Kurt Waldheim

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has concluded his investigation into the fate of the British prisoners of war interrogated by Group E during the period when Kurt Waldhiem was a senior intelligence officer.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Ministry of Defence is searching its records for information relating to four British service men whose names the hon. and learned Member sent to the Secretary of State for Defence in June. The search is nearing completion. I shall communicate the result to the hon. and learned Member when it is available.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instruction he has given to the British delegation to the Helsinki review conference in Vienna as regards attendance at any ceremony held in connection with the conference hosted by President Kurt Waldheim.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The British delegation will play an appropriate part in any ceremony held in connection with the conference.

PRIME MINISTER

Westland plc

43. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister (1) on what grounds a non-attributable disclosure to the Press Association was chosen as the means of bringing the Solicitor-General's letter of 6 January to the then Secretary of State for Defence into the public domain; and if she will make a statement;

(2) when she first learned of the letter sent by the Solicitor General to the former Secretary of State for defence in relation to Westlands;

(3) what the secretary to the Cabinet understood to be the possible consequences of a failure to establish an official inquiry into the leak of the Solicitor General's letter on the Westland affair, following his discussions with the Attorney-General in January 1986; and if she will make a statement;

(4) what discussions she had with the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) about the substance and details of her speech to the House on 27 January in relation to the Westland affair; and if she will make a statement;

(5) by what means and in what form she originally intended the letter of 6 January from the Solicitor General about the Westland affair to be brought into the public domain, prior to the leak of the letter on 6 January; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As was stated in paragraph 28 of the Government's response to the third and fourth reports of the Defence Committee, full accounts of the matters with which the fourth report was concerned have already been given by myself and other Ministers in statements in Parliament, speeches in debates and answers to parliamentary questions, and by the head of the home Civil Service in his evidence to the Committee. The Government stand by those accounts, and see no reason to qualify or add to them.

Security Services

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards publication of books by former members of the security services;

(2) if she will make a statement on the measures being taken by Her Majesty's Government to restrain publication in Australia about the security services.

The Prime Minister: Members and former members of the security service owe a lifelong duty of confidentiality to the Crown. Unauthorised publication by them of books about their work violates this obligation. The Attorney-General has accordingly applied in the Supreme Court of New South Wales for an injunction to prevent publication of a book by Mr. Peter Wright, a former member of the security service. The case is sub judice in Australia.

Mr. Vanunu

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister on what dates and for what reasons Mr. Vanunu had contact with Government Departments and agencies of Government since 1 September 1986.

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of any such contacts.

Moscow

Mr. Terlezki asked the Prime Minister in which month in 1987 she intends to visit Moscow.

The Prime Minister: I hope to take up Mr. Gorbachev's invitation to visit Moscow in the first half of next year. Dates are under discussion.

Work Test

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Department of Employment and the Department of Health and Social Security concerning the effect of the revised guidelines on the availability for work test on disabled people; if she will now transfer all responsibility for unemployment benefit to the Secretary of State for Social Services; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The two Departments have worked closely together on the revised availability for work test. The guidelines to local offices stress the importance of close liaison between the two Departments.

The Secretary of State for Social Services has responsibility for policy on unemployment benefit; the Department of Employment act as his agents in administering it.

A study is at present in progress into the relationship between the two Departments and their respective networks of offices. No conclusions have yet been reached.

SCOTLAND

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now reconsider his decision and appoint a judical panel comprising a judge and three lay assessors to investigate the circumstances of the present situation in Peterhead prison where a prison officer is being held hostage by some of the inmates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: No. Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland, has been asked to carry out a special investigation into complaints about conditions and treatment of prisoners at Peterhead prison and to report to the Secretary of State as quickly as possible. A copy of the terms of reference has been placed in the Library of the House.

I will consider whether further investigations or inquiries are required in the light of his findings.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing total expenditure within his budget as a percentage of total Government expenditure in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Rifkind: The figures showing expenditure on the Scotland programme as a percentage of total United Kingdom public expenditure in the years 1976-77 to 1985-86 are given in the table. They do not include the substantial amount of public expenditure incurred in Scotland by Departments other than my own. For example, over the same period, the share of total United Kingdom public expenditure on defence and social security rose from 36·4 per cent. to 42·7 per cent. Scotland has received its fair share of that additional expenditure reflected in these figures.

AIDS

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many babies with the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus have been born in each of the health board areas in Scotland in the past three years.

Mr. John MacKay: During the past three years, 26 babies have been born in Scotland of mothers with HIV infection: 20 in Lothian and six in Tayside Health Board areas. Blood tests have shown that some of these babies have antibodies to the AIDS virus, but is not yet clear whether they have developed their own antibodies, or whether the antibodies have been transferred from their mothers before birth.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the total cost of the national campaign to prevent acquired immune deficiency syndrome expressed as a percentage of the Scottish health budget.

Mr. John MacKay: So far, the Government has allocated £1·4 million centrally to fund measures to control the spread of AIDS in Scotland. In addition, substantial costs have been incurred by health boards in dealing with this disease, but it is not possible to identify this expenditure, so the total cost cannot be expressed as a percentage of the Scottish health budget.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome have been reported to health boards in each of the past three years.

Mr. John MacKay: The number of cases of AIDS reported to the communicable diseases (Scotland) unit is as follows:

	Cases
1984	3

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has given to health boards on the provision of care for persons suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Since August 1983, 13 circulars or letters of guidance have been issued by the Scottish Home and Health Department to health boards advising them about various matters relating to this disease.

M80

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce the line of the M80 between Stepps and Haggs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In line with new procedures introduced by the Scottish Development Department earlier this year for the appraisal of major road schemes, environmental consultants have been appointed to assess the effects of the route options for the proposed motorway. Reports are expected to be available about the end of this year, and my right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be in a position to select a line and publish draft orders soon thereafter.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received favouring a line of route for the M80 through the Kelvin valley; and how many favouring the upgrading of the A80 between Stepps and Haggs.

Mr. Ancram: While the Scottish Development Department has exchanged information with numerous individuals, councils and organisations who would be affected by the routes being considered for the M80 between Stepps and Haggs, no representations in favour of one route or another have so far been received.

Building Regulations

Mr. Gordon Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, following his consultations with the Building Standards Advisory Committee over changes in regulations under Part II of the Building (Scotland) Act 1970, the committee agrees to all the changes.

Mr. Michael Ancram: No. My right hon. and learned Friend greatly values, and always carefully considers, the advice he receives from the Building Standards Advisory Committee. There is, however, no statutory requirement for all changes to the building standards regulations to be agreed by the committee.

Queen's College, Glasgow

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions his officials have had with the governors of Queen's College, Glasgow regarding the future development of the college.

Mr. John MacKay: Consultations are proceeding between the Scottish Education Department and the Queen's college, Glasgow, on the possible transfer to the college of certain paramedical courses which are currently the responsibility of the National Health Service. This matter is linked with the provision of additional accommodation for the college at Eldon street, on which final decisions have not yet been taken.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Water Service

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement regarding the capital works schemes in each of the four divisions of the water service, outlining the total cost of such schemes in each division over the past five years which were designed by consultants and indicating what proportion of this work was undertaken by consultants who had their headquarters within the same divisions as the respective schemes.

(2) if he will make a statement regarding the capital works schemes in each of the four divisions of the water service outlining the total cost of such schemes in each division over the past five years which were designed by the central design unit and indicating what proportion of this work was undertaken by the central design unit offices located in the respective divisions.

Mr. Needham: The information requested insofar as it is readily available, is given in the following table for the financial years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85. Collation of these statistics for 1985-86 has not yet been completed. The disaggregation of schemes for 1984-85 according to the location of the consultant design firms employed is not at present available. Further research will be required to identify those schemes which were designed by central design unit teams based in the same divisional areas in which the projects were located. I will forward to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible details on these two points and the relevant statistics for 1985-86.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement indicating from which water service offices the work of consultants on the design of schemes in each of the four water service divisions is supervised.

Mr. Needham: The work of consultants designing water service schemes is monitored by central design unit teams in Belfast and Craigavon. Schemes in eastern division are supervised by the Belfast team, as are schemes in northern division, with the exception of schemes in the Magherafelt and Cookstown areas, which are supervised by the Craigavon team. Schemes in western and southern divisions are supervised by the Craigavon team.

Violent Deaths and Injuries

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of deaths and injuries arising from violence in Northern Ireland in each of the two periods of 12 months ended 15 November 1985 and 15 November 1986.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Vehicle Testing

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, at the Newtownards vehicle inspection centre what is (i) the operating hours each day, (ii) the number of vehicles being tested each day and (iii) the present waiting list of vehicles requiring tests.

Mr. Needham: The information is as follows:

(i) Operating hours for private car tests are 8.30 am to 1.00 pm and 1.30 pm to 4.55 pm Monday to Friday and for all other vehicles 8.45 am to 12.45 pm and 1.30 pm to 4.55 pm Monday to Friday.

(ii) During October 1986 the average number of vehicles tested per day in the Newtownards centre was 93.

(iii) The present waiting time from receipt of application to test appointment in the Newtownards Centre is three weeks for private cars and four weeks for all other vehicles.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many plastic bullets were fired by the Royal Ulster Constabulary; and how many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary were injured in street disturbances in each of the two periods of 12 months ended 15 November 1985 and 15 November 1986.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. King: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the amounts of money spent on major capital roads development in the roads service division, sections Ards, North Down, Lisburn and Downpatrick for each year since 1979.

Mr. Needham: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland carries out its roads service functions on a divisional basis. Within Downpatrick division it is estimated that expenditure on major works in the four sections is as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Car Parking Spaces

38. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will ensure that car parking spaces marked for hon. Members only are so reserved.

Mr. Biffen: The Services Committee has long recognised the convenience to hon. Members of being able to transfer their car parking permit to any Palace of Westminster pass holder acting on their behalf, but I will certainly ask the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee to look into these arrangements once more.

DEFENCE

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what factors determined the timing of the letter sent to Westland plc on 13 January by the Permanent Under-Secretary of State at the Ministry of Defence concerning Government policy on the future of the company.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given, earlier today, to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Submarines

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the nuclear-powered submarines known to have sunk in international waters since 1960.

Mr. Stanley: The United States attack submarine, the USS Thresher, was lost in April 1963 and the USS Scorpion in May 1968. The Soviet authorities announced the loss of a Yankee class ballistic missile submarine in October this year. My Department believes that a Soviet November class attack submarine was lost in April 1970 though this has not been announced, so far as we are aware, by the Soviet authorities. My Department is not aware of any other losses of nuclear-powered submarines in international waters in this period.

Equestrian Events

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement as to the policy with regard to the assistance of service personnel at equestrian events, to include information on repayment and the levels of compulsion applied to service personnel.

Mr. Freeman: Service personnel may assist with displays and other such events, including equestrian events, provided this would not be to the detriment of military commitments. In most circumstances those involved would be volunteers; costs would normally be charged to the organisers.

US National Guard

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the United States National Guard have been involved in duties in the United Kingdom in each of the past six years.

Mr. Stanley: No US national guardsmen are based in the United Kingdom, although some guardsmen have undertaken routine military training in the United Kingdom in each of the last six years to practise their war role as a reserve force in support of regular US forces assigned to NATO. Precise figures for the numbers who have trained in the United Kingdom in each of these years are not held centrally and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

Computers

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultancy advice was available to his Department in deciding to purchase each of the Cray computer systems now operational at research establishments in his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Purchase of the Cray computer systems was handled under normal procurement procedure and involved wide consultation within the Ministry of Defence. The Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency of HM Treasury gave advice through participation in the evaluation team.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the accounting policy of his Department in regard to purchases of major computer systems for use at research establishments, stating whether the cost of such a system is included within the costs of specific research and development projects.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The purchase of scientific computer systems at defence research establishments would be a charge to Defence Vote 2a4. Major systems would normally be regarded as an overhead cost, which are, however, taken into account in assessing the full cost of a project.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the management and accounting systems under which decisions are taken to purchase major computer systems for use at his Department's research establishments; and what person or persons are authorised to order a computer system costing more than £1 million for use at any such establishment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All procurement for major computer systems is handled on behalf of the Department by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency of the Treasury. Subject to Treasury and ministerial approval where necessary, financial authority for the purchase of scientific computers is delegated to the Controller R&D Establishments, Research and Nuclear.

Royal Naval Reserve

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there had been any cutbacks in Royal Naval Reserve training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There have been no cutbacks in RNR training.

P2000 Class

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many units of the Royal Naval Reserve have been provided with P2000 class vessels.

Mr. Freeman: Three RNR units have so far been provided with P2000 (Archer) class vessels.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many P2000 class vessels have been delivered to university Royal Navy units.

Mr. Freeman: The university Royal Naval units are equipped with Tracker class vessels, of which there are five. It is not intended to allocate P2000 (Archer) craft to these units.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence which British universities are currently taking part in research work on strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is for the universities concerned to decide whether or not to make this information available.

Chinook Helicopters

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there have been any accidents involving the RAF's Chinook helicopters.

Mr. Freeman: There have been two major accidents involving RAF Chinook helicopters. Details of the first, on 14 November 1984, are contained in a military aircraft accident summary, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. The second occurred on 13 May this year when a helicopter crashed in extreme weather in the Falkland Islands. A board of inquiry is examining the circumstances of this accident and it would not therefore be appropriate for me to comment further.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the RAF has experienced any technical problems with its Chinook helicopters.

Mr. Freeman: Technical problems are to be expected in maintaining and operating any sophisticated equipment. Such technical problems as have been encountered with the RAF's Chinook helicopters have not affected the operational capability of this aircraft.

AIDS

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there have been any cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the Armed Forces.

Mr. Freeman: There have been no cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in the regular armed forces. There has been one case in the Territorial Army.

Equipment

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any cuts have been made in the Army's equipment budget.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Army's equipment programme was described in the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986 (Cmnd. 9763). As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in his statement on 6 November (column 1085) provision for defence remains substantially as previously planned.

Training

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many North Atlantic Treaty Organisation navigators are currently undergoing training at TTTE RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: Twenty four.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots are currently undergoing training at TTTE RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: Forty one.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation trainee navigators are currently undergoing training at No. 6 FTS Finningley.

Mr. Freeman: Four.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation navigators are currently being given low level training in Hawk aircraft at RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: None.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots are currently being given low level training in Hawk aircraft at RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: None.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots have trained at TTTE RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: Thirteen.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation navigators have trained at tri-national Tornado training establishment at Royal Air Force Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: Twelve.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the role of the tri-national Tornado training establishment at RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: The role of the tri-national Tornado training establishment at RAF Cottesmore is to provide training for Tornado crews from the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy, and other nations as appropriate.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any of the RAF training commitment at the TTTE RAF Cottesmore have been diverted to training non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots and navigators.

Mr. Freeman: The RAF training programme has been modified to allow a small number of non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots and navigators to be trained on the Tornado, by agreement with Germany and Italy. None are currently being trained.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation navigators are currently being trained at TTTE RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: None.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation pilots are currently being trained at TTTE RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: None.

SP70

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost of British participation in the SP70 project to date.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The estimated cost of United Kingdom participation in the SP70 trinational development programme to date has been some £88 million.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Britain intends to withdraw from the SP70 programme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Ministers are reviewing the way ahead on the SP70 trinational programme in the light of recommendations from the national armaments directors. It is hoped to reach decisions as soon as possible.

Ministerial Visit

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent visit of the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to Japan and South Korea.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend, the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, visited Japan and South Korea from 13 to 20 October to discuss the scope for defence sales and collaboration. He was accompanied to Japan by a group of senior business men from British aerospace companies some of whom also continued with him to South Korea. In Japan he met Ministers and officials from the Japanese Defence Agency and the Ministry of International Trade and Industry and also had a number of meetings with Japanese industrial leaders and senior political figures. Discussions covered a range of possible areas of co-operation including, in particular, Japan's future requirement for a fighter aircraft.

In South Korea, my noble Friend also had a number of meetings with Ministers and officials together with senior representatives from several major industrial companies. As in Japan, he was most warmly received and discussed a number of projects of current mutual interest. He was able to press the case for British companies and to assure his hosts of Her Majesty's Government's full support for their efforts.

Japan and South Korea are not markets where British Aerospace companies have been especially successful in the past, but the visit served to underline the new determination now being shown by those companies.

EMPLOYMENT

Work Test

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General what account he took of Commissioners' decisions CU 235/59 (KL), R3/60 (UB), R6/60 (UB), R26/60 (UB) and R29/60 (UB) before devising the new rules on the availability for work test for people with domestic responsibilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These are matters for the independent adjudication authorities who were consulted in preparing the new guidelines on availability testing.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General (1) if he referred his proposals on the availability for work test to (a) the Social Security Advisory Committee, (b) the National Advisory Council on the Employment of Disabled People or (c) any other advisory committee; if he will now undertake urgent consultations on the effect of the rules on disabled people; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received on the effect of the new guidelines on the availability for work test on disabled people; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have made no changes to the benefit entitlement conditions for sick or disabled people and no change in the law. Therefore, there is no reason to consult these bodies.

The new availability questionnaire will more readily enable us to identify claimants, including the sick, disabled and those who care for them, who may be entitled to benefits other than those that require them to be available for work. It will also identify people who can be given help by disablement resettlement officers.

I have received no representations on the effect of the new guidelines on disabled people.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Paymaster General (1) what is the total number of persons being seen on an average day by benefit officers conducting availability testing interviews in the St. Helens area;

(2) what is the total number of persons whose benefit has been terminated or suspended as a result of interviews conducted on the availability test in the St. Helens area;

(3) if he will make it his policy to advise claimants interviewed on the availability test in the St. Helens area to seek independent advice before completion of the questionnaire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The unemployment benefit office at St. Helens did not take part in the experimental testing of availability for work other than keeping statistics for comparison purposes. There were no suspensions or disallowances on availability grounds arising out of the experiment although the usual procedure followed by all offices would identify some cases of doubtful availability in the normal way.

In the past, claimants have not been advised to seek independent advice before completion of claim forms and I do not intend to change this policy.

Restart

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Paymaster General how many people in Wales have so far lost unemployment benefit as a result of the restart programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No one loses benefit solely as a result of the restart programme. People are not entitled to benefit under long-standing legal rules if they fail to attend an interview, or are not available for work or refuse suitable employment.

At 9 October 1986 the number of people in Wales who had lost benefit because of failure to attend a restart interview was 290, the number of people in Wales who lost benefit because of their non-availability for work as disclosed by a restart interview was 53 and the number of people in Wales who lost benefit because of refusal of suitable employment was 10.

Statistical records do not distinguish between unemployment and supplementary benefit.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of persons in St. Helens who have had their benefits suspended for failure to attend restart interviews at the latest date available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Up to 9 October 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, three people in St. Helens had been disallowed unemployment or supplementary benefit by independent adjudication officers for failure to attend restart interviews.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General if he will list the electoral wards in the west midlands region where unemployment is above the national average and the percentage change since May 1979.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available. Unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. However, numbers of unemployed claimants in the electoral wards of the west midlands region from June 1983 are available in the Library.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General if he will list those parliamentary constituencies in the United Kingdom where unemployment is above the national average, giving, in each case, the numbers of jobless now and in May 1979; and the percentage increase.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available. Unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. However numbers of unemployed claimants in the parliamentary constituencies of the United Kingdom from June 1983 are available in the Library.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of persons registered unemployed in the St. Helens area at the last date available.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 9 October 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the St. Helens local authority area was 14,679.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General what is the number of claimants registered as unemployed in (a) employment benefit offices and (b) jobcentres throughout the United Kingdom in each of the regions in Liverpool, in Norwich and in the travel-to-work areas of Cromer and North Walsham (i) in October 1985 and (ii) in October 1986.

Mr. Lee: Information on the numbers of unemployed claimants registered at jobcentres is not available. The table gives the numbers of unemployed claimants signing on at unemployment benefit offices in the areas requested at October 1985 and October 1986. This information is available in the Library. Comparisons of unemployment figures between October 1985 and October 1986 are affected by the change in the timing of the compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986.

Community Programme

Dr. Godman asked the Paymaster General if the inquiry by the Manpower Services Commission into the funding of certain community programme projects administered by the Renfrewshire, Dumbartonshire, Argyll and Bute community programme area office has yet been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The report of the inquiry by Manpower Services Commission officials has now been received and is being considered in detail.

I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible about the outcome of the inquiries.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of persons registered on community programme placements in the St. Helens area at the last date available.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to give information in the form requested. However, at the end of September, the latest date for which statistics are available, there were 4,649 people employed on community programmes in the Merseyside outer area. This includes the Metropolitan borough council area of Knowsley, Sefton and St. Helens.

Strikes

Mr. Stern asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to review the operation of legislation relating to the calling of national strikes without a ballot.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As a result of our 1984 Trade Union Act, unions which fail to ballot their members before calling them out on strike lose their immunity from legal action. Employers and others damaged by the action may therefore seek a court injunction and sue for damages.

Employers have shown themselves ready to use this remedy, but I continue to keep the situation under review.

Stallite Batteries

Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General if he will require the employment medical advisory service and Her Majesty's factory inspectorate to devote more resources to investigating working conditions at Stallite Batteries, Bolton on Dearne; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: No. I am satisfied that the Health and Safety Executive has made and will continue to make available sufficient resources to investigate working conditions at Stallite Batteries.

Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General on what dates since March Her Majesty's factory inspectorate visited Stallite Batteries, Bolton on Dearne; and what specific action was taken following each visit.

Mr. Trippier: Her Majesty's factory inspectorate visited Stallite Batteries Ltd., at Bolton on Dearne on 18 March, 24 April, 8 May, 28 May, 27 June and 14 August 1986 to give advice before production started. Advisory letters were sent after five of these visits.

Visits were made on 2 September 1986 and 13 November 1986 to inspect the production process. A letter was sent after the visit on 2 September and written confirmation of the verbal advice given at the visit on 13 November will be sent shortly.

Meetings were also held at the premises on 24 September and 7 October at which advice was given.

Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General (1) on each occasion when the employment medical advisory service took blood samples at Stallite Batteries, how many blood lead levels were found in the following categories (a) males 09-19 mg/100ml, 20-39 mg/100ml, 40-59 mg/100ml, 60-69 mg/100ml, and 70+ mg/100ml and (b) females 0-19 mg/100ml, 20-39 mg/100ml, 40-59 mg/100ml, 60-69 mg/100ml, 70+ mg/100ml.

(2) on which dates since March blood samples were taken by the employment medical advisory service, for lead levels, at Stallite Batteries, Bolton on Dearne.

Mr. Trippier: The table shows the dates on which blood samples were taken and the number of results in each category. Workers with high blood lead levels will have blood samples taken more frequently. The number of results in the higher end of the range are thus more an indication of the frequency of sampling than of the number of workers with those levels.

Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General what action the employment medical advisory service has recommended that Stallite Batteries takes to ensure safe working conditions at its Bolton on Dearne factory.

Mr. Trippier: The employment medical advisory service has made frequent visits and advised on a number of aspects of the medical supervision of employees exposed to lead.

Lead Poisoning

Mr Patchett asked the Paymaster General how many cases of occupational lead poisoning have been recorded in Britain for each year since 1974 (Health and Safety at Work Act); and how many of these cases each year were in the lead/acid battery manufacturing industry.

Mr. Trippier: The table below shows the total number of cases of lead poisoning reported each year. I regret that there is no full information about how many of these were in the battery manufacturing industry.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Airbus (Launch Aid)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Government policy regarding launch aid for the Airbus A330/340 projects.

Mr. Pattie: The position of British Aerospace's launch aid application remains for the time being as set out in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 5 November 1986 at columns 949-50.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the United Kingdom share of world trade in manufactured goods in each year since 1980 (a) by volume and (b) by value.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on 22 October 1986 at columns 893-4.

Japanese Companies (UK)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many Japanese companies are now established and operating in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Separate statistics are not available, but it is estimated that there are about 450 Japanese companies established and operating in the United Kingdom. These include financial institutions and sales, trading and manufacturing companies.

Imports (Japan)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will set out the types of industrial and consumer goods imported from Japan into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will set out the type of industrial and consumer goods which are exported to Japan; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what was the balance of trade between the United Kingdom and Japan for the years 1975 to 1980, 1980 to 1985 or the latest available figure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The crude balance of trade with Japan for the period 1975 to 1980 showed a deficit of £4,123 million, and for the period 1980 to 1985 a deficit of £13,179 million. The 10 major commodities traded with Japan in 1985 were as follows:

PCRL Radio, Handsworth

Ms Clare Short asked the Secretary of Sate for Trade and Industry on how many occasions PCRL radio station in Handsworth has been raided by his Department; and what is the value of the equipment confiscated.

Mr. Butcher: This unlicensed broadcasting station has been raided on 30 occasions by my Department's radio investigation service. As much of the equipment seized is secondhand or home-built it is not possible to make a realistic estimate of its value.

Illegal Radio Stations

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many raids have been undertaken in the past 12 months on radio stations broadcastings illegally; and what is the total value of the equipment confiscated.

Mr. Butcher: During the past 12 months, my Department's radio investigation service has carried out 218 raids on 84 different unlicensed broadcasting stations. Equipment seized by the RIS is detained under its powers under section 79 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 and at the conclusion of a successful prosecution it is for the court of law to decide whether the equipment shall be forfeit. Much of the equipment is secondhand or home-built and it is therefore not possible to make a realistic estimate of its value

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his best available estimate of the number of radio stations broadcasting without a licence in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: My Department is aware of 34 unlicensed stations currently broadcasting. The great majority of them broadcast intermittently.

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how the Solicitor-General's letter to the then Secretary of State for Defence was brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry's press secretary; and how soon this was done after it was received by the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's private office;

(2) whether the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry discussed with his private secretary or his chief information officer the possibility of disclosing the contents of the Solicitor-General's letter to the then Secretary of State for Defence, before extracts from the letter were read to him over the telephone on 6 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Imperial Continental Gas Association (Takeover)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the proposed takeover of Imperial Continental Gas Association by Gulf Resources (UK) plc to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Howard: The proposed acquisition of Imperial Continental Gas Association by Gulf Resources (UK) plc is being considered by the Director General of Fair Trading. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make his decision on whether to refer the proposed acquisition to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in the light of the director general's advice.

Robots

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the number of robots employed in industry, in each of the last six years.

Mr. Butcher: The number of robots employed in industry, in each of the last six years, is as follows:

Year	Number of robots in United Kingdom industry
1980	371
1981	713
1982	1,152
1983	1,753
1984	2,623
1985	3,208
1986	[1]3,650

Note: The figures for years 1980-85 have been taken from the British Robot Association annual surveys.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, as a percentage of the cost, grants available to industry from the Government, to purchase robots, in each of the last six years.

Mr. Butcher: Grants have been available for the purchase of industrial robots for innovative applications for most of the last six years. The percentage grant towards the costs varied as follows:—

	Per cent.
1981 to June 1982	25·00
June 1982 to August 1984	33·33
August 1984 to June 1986	20·00

Since June 1986, grants have no longer been available.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent investigations have been carried out by the British Steel Corporation into energy conservation; and what savings or potential savings have been identified.

Mr. Giles Shaw: One of the corporation's continuing objectives is to reduce its energy costs. To this end, it maintains a programme of energy audits and adopts improvements in conservation and energy management wherever these are likely to be cost-effective. The details are a matter for the corporation.

Energy consumed per tonne of liquid steel produced fell from 25 to 21·2 gigajoules between 1980-81 and 1985-86.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Correspondence

44. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he hopes to reply to the letter written to the former Minister of State on 1 July about Mrs. E. Hitchins of The Beeches, Roborough, Plymouth, and attendance allowances, and the subsequent letter written on 9 October to his Private Secretary asking for an early reply; and if he will make a statement as to why there has been a four-month delay.

Mr. Lyell: I have written to my hon. Friend today.

NHS (General Managers)

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that no performance bonus payments are made to National Health Service general managers for reducing services in the area for which they are responsible; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Performance-related pay, when awarded, will follow an assessment of a general manager's performance at the end of a set period against a range of objectives which will have been set at the beginning of that period. The objectives should cover the key areas in which the general manager is expected to achieve results and will reflect the operational plan approved by the health authority in the light of its strategic programme and of the resources which it expects to have at its disposal.

Handicapped People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were registered as handicapped by local authority social services departments in England at the last date for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: Information on the numbers of persons registered with social services departments as physically or sensorily handicapped is collected triennially and the latest available data are given in the table.

England—Number of registered handicapped as at 31 March

Registration category	Numbers of persons registered
1982 Blind and partially sighted [1]
Blind	111,729

[2] But excludes persons on the register of the blind.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reply to the letter of 18 July from the right hon. Member for Brent, East enclosing a copy of a paper entitled "Combating Cold Homes".

Mr. Lyell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment sent a co-ordinated reply on 13 November.

J. E. Hanger (Dismissals)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients are now known to be affected by the dismissal of workers at J. E. Hanger, artificial limb makers.

Mr. Major: Of the 58 postponed appointments at Roehampton several have now been reinstated and we are taking urgent action in respect of the remainder. However, I am concerned that other patients may be facing delays due to the interruption in the delivery of artificial limbs and we are actively examining this matter with the company. I should add that the great bulk of the service is being maintained and there were some 21,000 patient attendances for prosthetic services at the 30 artificial limb and appliance centres in England between 13 September 1986 and 7 November 1986.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the estimated number of non-pensioners in the United Kingdom whose income is based on supplementary benefit and other forms of benefit received from his Department; what was the number in May 1979; and what was the percentage change;

(2) if he will list the total number of those in the west midlands region of working age who are in receipt of supplementary benefit or other forms of benefit from his Department, the number in May 1979 and the percentage change.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list (a) constituencies and (b) by cities, towns and boroughs the percentage number of those of working age who were in receipt of supplementary benefit and the percentage change since May 1979.

Mr. Lyell: Information about (a) all constituencies could be obtained only by disproportionate cost and (b) by cities, towns and boroughs is not available.

Single Payments

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Brighton have received single payments in each year since 1982.

Mr. Lyell: Information is not available in the precise form requested as some claimants may have received more than one payment. During the years ending in early April the numbers of single payments awarded by the Department's Brighton office were as follows:

	Number
1982-83	3,275
1983-84	3,722
1984-85	4,906
1985-86	7,771

Drug Rehabilitation Centres

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those health authorities presently running drug rehabilitation centres (a) exclusively for drug addicts and (b) including alcoholics.

Mrs. Currie: The BBC/SCODA National Directory "Drug Problems—Where to Get Help" gives details of rehabilitation services for drug misusers, including facilities which also provide services for problem drinkers. Copies of the directory, which was partially funded by this Department, have been placed in the Library.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those health authorities presently providing in-patient beds for the exclusive use of drug addicts.

Mrs. Currie: At December 1985 National Health Service returns for mental illness hospitals indicated that there was a special unit exclusively for the in-patient treatment of drug misusers in each of the district health authorities given in the table.

Region	District
South East Thames	Brighton Bexley West Lambeth
Wessex	Portsmouth and South East Hampshire
Oxford	Oxfordshire
North Western	Salford
Special Health Authority	Bethlem Royal and Maudsley

Similar information is not collected centrally for other hospitals.

Health Authorities (Returns)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when his Department received the last SBH 203 return from a district health authority for 31 March;

(2) on what dates in each year since 1979 SBH 203 returns for 31 March have been published by his Department;

(3) what was the thing which his Department told telephone inquiries on 7 November was delaying the publication of SBH 203 returns for 31 March;

(4) what are the differences between the total hospital waiting list figures for 31 March published by his Department and the total of the lists as submitted by district health authorities in their SBH 203 returns.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Accident and Emergency Departments (Closure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the accident and emergency department closure proposals submitted to him for decision in each year since 1979 and the outcome in each case.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Accident and emergency accommodation is the responsibility of district health authorities.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if in considering proposals for the closure of accident and emergency departments, he takes into consideration whether neighbouring hospitals have such departments.

Mrs. Currie: In considering proposals for the closure of accident and emergency departments submitted to us in accordance with the procedures in circular HSC (IS) 207, we would indeed take account of whether neighbouring hospitals had such departments.

Great Ormond Street Hospital

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the total value of new equipment in the rehabilitated cardiac block at the Great Ormond Street hospital; what is the value of equipment bought for installation when the block was new but since stored; and what is the value of any equipment bought originally but used elsewhere in the meantime;

(2) to whom equipment originally intended for use in the cardiac block at Great Ormond Street hospital was sold; and when.

Mrs. Currie: The value of new equipment needed for the rehabilitated cardiac wing at the hospital for sick children, Great Ormond street to supplement that originally bought and either stored or temporarily used elsewhere in the hospital is approximately £2·5 million.

The value of the equipment bought for installation when the wing was built was £1,842,000. Of this amount, equipment costing £196,000 was stored, equipment costing £450,000 was sold during 1980-1983 to the Royal Marsden hospital, London chest hospital and Cardiff children's hospital, and equipment costing £1,196,000 has in the meantime been used elsewhere in the hospital.

AIDS

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the likely extent of acquired immune deficiency syndrome over the next five years;

(2) what additional resources will be required by the hospitals service to cope with his estimate of the likely incidence of acquired immune deficiency syndrome over the next five years;

(3) if he will list those hospitals offering blood tests for HIV, giving the number of people tested; and how many proved positive;

(4) if he will give the number of people suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome currently being treated in National Health Service hospitals;

(5) how many haemophiliacs tested for HIV have proved positive; and what proportion this represents of haemophiliacs receiving blood products from the National Blood Tranfusion Service;

(6) which health authorities are providing resources for the treatment or study of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(7) when the Government first financed research into the causes and treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(8) if he will make a statement on the British Government's contacts with the World Health Organisation or other Governments on the subject of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(9) when his Department first became aware of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(10) when his Department first became aware that acquired immune deficiency syndrome was a sexually transmitted disease;

(11) when his Department first became aware that acquired immune deficiency syndrome could be transmitted through blood and blood products;

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Maternal Deaths

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the maternal deaths registered in England and Wales in each of the years from 1979 to 1984 were of women born in the New Commonwealth and Pakistan; and if he will subdivide these into (i) direct maternal deaths and (ii) indirect maternal deaths.

Mrs. Currie: The information is given in the table.

Number of maternal deaths registered in England and Wales to women born in the New Commonwealth and Pakistan: underlying cause (i) direct and (ii) indirect maternal deaths—1979-84

[2] International Classification of Diseases (ICD) 9th revision 630-676 excluding 647 and 648.
[3] ICD(9) 647 and 648.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation requiring local authorities to help supplementary benefit claimants with their rent within 14 days of them receiving a housing benefit certificate.

Mr. Lyell: The Housing Benefit Regulations 1985 already require local authorities to make a first payment of housing benefit to supplementary benefit recipients within 14 days of receipt of a certificate or as soon as possible afterwards. The regulations also provide that if a local authority is unable to determine a supplementary benefit recipient's entitlement to a rent allowance within 14 days it must make interim payments on the basis of the available information unless no information about rent has been provided.

Leukaemia and Lymphatic Cancer

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the preliminary findings of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys report into incidences of leukaemia and lymphatic cancer among people of 25 years or younger in the Burghfield/Aldermaston areas and in other controlled areas.

Mrs. Currie: The report is being finalised, and will be published as soon as possible.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a table setting out social security expenditure (a) in cash terms, (b) as a percentage of total public expenditure, (c) as a percentage of gross domestic product, (d) showing the real-terms percentage increase on the previous year and (e) the percentage of the real-terms increase spent on (i) increased numbers of claimants, (ii) real-terms increase in benefit levels and (iii) new benefits or extension of eligibility for each year from 1979-80 to 1986-87, including the autumn statement projections.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the regional and district health authority reports on cervical cancer.

Mrs. Currie: No, but they will form the basis for future planning and improvement of these services.

Benefits

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish information showing how many claimants in Brighton have had their benefit (a) reduced and (b) withdrawn in connection with the restart scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

No one can lose their benefit entitlement solely as a result of the restart programme. Under long-standing legal rules people can lose their entitlement to benefit if they fail to attend an interview or are not available for work. At 9 October 1986 the number of claimants who had their benefits disallowed in Brighton after receiving an invitation to an interview under the restart scheme was 58.

Most of these were for failure to attend a restart interview, but if, subsequently, a claimant agrees to attend an interview then benefit is reinstated.

We do not keep statistical records of the number of benefit reductions but this rarely applies to anyone affected by the restart scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish information showing how many claimants in the London borough of Newham have had their benefits (a) reduced and (b) withdrawn in connection with the restart scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

No one can lose their benefit entitlement solely as a result of the restart programme. Under long-standing legal rules people can lose their entitlement to benefit if they fail to attend an interview or are not available for work. At 9 October 1986 the number of claimants who had their benefits disallowed in the London borough of Newham after receiving an invitation to an interview under the restart scheme was 413. Most of these were for failure to attend a restart interview but if subsequently a claimant agrees to attend an interview then benefit if re-instated. We do not keep statistical records of the number of benefit reductions but this rarely applies to anyone affected by the restart scheme.

CIVIL SERVICE

Appointments

Mr. Williams asked the Minister for the Civil Service in what circumstances an outside organisation is directly involved in appointments to posts of which the holder is to be a certificated member of the Civil Service; and what safeguards apply to such appointments.

Mr. Luce: Outside selection consultants may occasionally be used to supplement the normal recruitment arrangements where they can provide expert knowledge of the market for particular skills and access to candidates who might not otherwise respond to public advertisement. Outside employers may be invited to nominate individuals for consideration where it is judged appropriate for a post to be filled by short-term secondment to the Civil Service. Suitably qualified experts from outside organisations may also be invited to participate in selection boards. The principal safeguard in these and other appointments is the need for the qualifications of those proposed for appointment to be approved by the Civil Service Commissioners in accordance with the requirement of the Civil Service Order in Council 1982.

Mr. Williams asked the Minister for the Civil Service in what circumstances it is unnecessary for there to be a public advertisement of a post of which the holder is to be a certificated member of the Civil Service but which is to be open to persons who are not current members of the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: Whether posts have to be publicly advertised is a matter for the Civil Service Commissioners; recruitment schemes have to be sufficiently publicised to their satisfaction. The circumstances in which the commissioners may waive the requirement for open competition are set out in regulation 11 of the Civil Service Commission General Regulations 1986. A copy is in the Library of the House.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that the new form of income tax assessment incorporates a demand note in the form of a bank giro credit, it is the intention of the Inland Revenue to treat the tax as paid when it is paid into the payer's bank, or when the amount of tax is received by the collector of taxes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Where a taxpayer makes a payment of tax at a branch bank using the bank giro system, the Inland Revenue treats the date stamped on the payslip by the bank cashier as the date of payment.

European Monetary System

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what specific measures would be available to the United Kingdom Government to enable them to fufil their obligations to maintain the value of sterling within agreed margins in the event of the United Kingdom joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The usual tools of interest rates and intervention.

Building Societies

Mr. Eastham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to provide for protection of building society depositors against the consequences of unauthorised withdrawal of their deposits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Building Societies Act 1986 provides that every building society must be a member of an authorised ombudsman scheme. This requirement takes effect from 1 July 1987. An individual will be able to refer to the ombudsman unresolved disputes with his building society in a number of fields, including the operation of deposit and share accounts. I do not, therefore, think that there is any present need for further legislation. General issues which might arise from unauthorised withdrawals through cash dispensers and automated teller machines will fall within the scope of the review of the law affecting banking services, which I announced on 14 November.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will (a) list all the organisations which submitted a response to the Green Paper, "The Reform of Personal Taxation" and (b) state how many of these supported the proposal for a system of transferrable tax allowances.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Family Incomes

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families with children had incomes below the tax threshold; and how many of these were in working families at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC Budget

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the provision for net payments to the European Economic Community in the current financial year has been increased by £440,000,000 in the revised public expenditure plans; if he will publish a table showing the net contributions in each of the previous seven years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Privatisation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the number of individual shareholders retaining shares in each of the concerns privatised by Her Majesty's Government since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The number of shareholdings in each of the companies privatised since 1979 is as follows:

Company	Number of Shareholdings following privatisation[1]	Latest published number of Shareholdings[1]
British Aerospace	157,829	136,505
Cable and Wireless	151,796	210,994
Amersham International	63,760	6,572
Britoil	37,257	245,556
Associated British Ports	37,205	N/A
Enterprise Oil	13,695	14,166
Jaguar	125,000	42,939
British Telecom	2,051,373	1,581,841

[1] These figures are not an exact guide to the number of shareholders in each company, because some holdings are held jointly in more than one name. They also include holdings in the employee share schemes.

VAT (Listed Buildings)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent value added tax is refundable on building materials and labour costs used in the repair and renovation of grade II listed buildings.

Mr. Brooke: Repairs and maintenance of listed buildings are taxable at the standard rate. Approved alterations to such buildings are zero-rated. Refunds as such are not available, though persons registered for VAT may be able to recover all or some of any tax charged to them where the expenditure has been incurred for business purposes, by the operation of the normal input tax credit mechanism.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the gross national product was taken up by public expenditure in the financial year 1978-79; and what is the estimated percentage in the current financial year.

Mr. MacGregor: General Government expenditure as a percentage of GDP was 43¼ per cent. in 1978-79 and rose to 46¾ per cent. in 1982-83. Since then it has fallen in each year and is expected to be 43¼ per cent. in 1986-87 and to fall to 41¼ per cent. in 1989-90. The figures were published in table 2.1 of the 1986 autumn statement.

National Debt

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the size of the national debt in May 1979; and what is the size of the debt on the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: The national debt, defined as the nominal liabilities of the National Loans Fund, is calculated as at 31 March each year. The national debt at 31 March 1979 stood at £86·9 billion. The provisional cash figure for 31 March 1986 is £171·4 billion. Full details of the national debt are published annually in the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund accounts supplementary statements. Those for 1985-86 will be published next month.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the areas of application of value added tax liability in respect of which the European Commission is seeking to persuade the European Court that the zero rate applied by the United Kingdom is in conflict with European law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The EC Commission has challenged the United Kingdom's zero-rating of certain goods and services in the following categories:

Animal feeding stuffs.
Sewerage services and water.
News services.
Fuel and power.
Construction and buildings.
Protective clothing and footwear.

in so far as they are not for clearly defined social reasons or for the benefit of the final consumer.

Tax Relief

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the estimated yearly tax relief payable on life assurance premiums and pension contributions in each financial year from 1979-80 to date.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Unemployed Persons (Benefits)

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the revenue raised by taxing benefits to the unemployed in financial years (a) 1982-83, (b) 1983-84, (c) 1984-85 and (d) 1985-86; and what is the estimate for 1986-87.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates of the yield from the taxation of unemployment benefits are currently under review: when this review has been completed, I shall write to the hon. Member with our latest estimates.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 18 November 1986

PRIME MINISTER

Falklands Fisheries

Q46. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister what information she has about the policy of the Spanish Government towards recognition of the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone.

The Prime Minister: I have no information beyond the comments which the Spanish Government have made publicly.

Land Use and Rural Policy

Q52. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Department of Agriculture and other Departments on the development of land use and rural policy.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

EC (Budgetary Control)

Q167. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the progress in achieving budgetary control of European Economic spending, which commenced on 1 January in accordance with the agreement of the European Council on 4 December 1984; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The control of European Community spending is a constant battle. The Government regretted that exceptional circumstances made it necessary to exceed the strict budget discipline limits in the 1986 budget. The Council's draft budget for 1987 is fully consistent with the budget discipline conclusions agreed by the Council in December 1984, though the Commission has warned that on present policies a substantial overrun of agricultural guarantee expenditure is likely.

Family Life

Q186. Mr. Rathbone asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied that there is sufficient co-ordination between Government Departments to encourage family life in all its aspects.

The Prime Minister: In so far as this is a matter for Government—yes.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her statement of 12 November, Official Report, column 24, she will publish details of information available to her of cases where nuclear blackmail has been used successfully against a non-nuclear country.

The Prime Minister: The purpose of NATO's forces is to deter a potential aggressor from threatening or launching an attack. NATO's deterrence strategy of flexible response, in which nuclear weapons play a key role, has contributed crucially to the long period of peace with freedom which we continue to enjoy in western Europe.

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards a threat to use United Kingdom nuclear weapons or the United Kingdom nuclear deterrent against a non-nuclear country.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom threatens no one. The purpose of British defence policy is to deter aggression or the threat of aggression against us.

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will provide details of discussions between the United Kingdom and the United States Governments prior to the Reykjavik summit regarding the extent to which (a) nuclear weapons based in Britain and (b) the United Kingdom nuclear deterrent would be bargaining factors in the negotiations; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We have remained in close contact with the United States Administration about the Geneva nuclear and space talks both before and since the meeting in Reykjavik. I had an opportunity to have a full discussion of all these issues with President Reagan on 15 November.

Office of Population Censuses and Surveys

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Prime Minister whether she will announce the main conclusions on the machinery of government review of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

The Prime Minister: I have now considered the report of the machinery of government review of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) which began on 2 June. I have concluded that OPCS should remain as a separate department with its present range of activities, and that ministerial responsibility for OPCS should continue to rest with the Secretary of State for Social Services.

The report recommended a number of administrative measures to clarify the relationship between OPCS and Ministers, and to ensure that the work OPCS undertakes for customer Departments properly reflects their requirements and priorities on a value for money basis. The measures recommended include the development of a clear statement of objectives and targets for OPCS, together with systems for monitoring and reporting results to Ministers, more rigorous repayment arrangements with the general objective of ensuring that customer Departments pay for work commissioned from OPCS's social survey division, a testing of the ability of private sector firms to undertake a wider range of Government social surveys, and an examination of the scope for greater efficiency in the provision of administrative support functions to OPCS. I have asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to take the lead in pursuing the recommendations, and to commission a review of internal management and administrative support arrangements to report to him and to me by the end of March 1987.

The trade union sides at OPCS will be consulted about the implementation of these recommendations, and will be shown relevant parts of the report.

Engagements

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I attended the memorial service for Henry Moore and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience with Her Majesty The Queen.

DEFENCE

Departmental Land

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to sell off land owned by his Department which is surplus to requirement, or is dormant, derelict, under-utilised or vacant.

Mr. Freeman: It is my Department's policy to dispose of any of its property which is surplus to current or planned requirements.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the results of the land review recently undertaken by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The report of the Plymouth area study has been completed only recently and the study team's recommendations have yet to be considered in detail by the Ministry of Defence. Because of the report's complexity consideration will necessarily take several months. A statement will be made in due course.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Companies (Japan)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many British companies are established and operational in Japan up until the last available figure, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No complete list is available, but we estimate that approximately 185 British companies are established in Japan through full manufacturing operations, subsidiary companies, joint ventures or sales offices. The number has been growing recently in response to new market opportunities.

Balance of Trade (Japan)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representation has been made to Japan to seek to ensure a more balanced trade between the United Kingdom and Japan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Clark: The United Kindom, together with our Community partners, has pressed Japan to take further steps to open up her domestic markets and to adopt macro-economic and structural policies designed to reduce trade surpluses. In addition, a number of individual cases have been raised concerning difficulties faced by British importers.

European Space Agency

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on future United Kingdom funding to the European Space Agency.

Mr. Pattie: The Government are considering United Kingdom participation in the future programmes of the European Space Agency in the context of the national space plan prepared by the British National Space Centre. I shall make an announcement about our conclusions in due course.

Printing Employees (Training)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has any plans to assist in the purchase of capital equipment for use in the training of printing employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Officials of the Department are informally discussing with representatives of the printing industry, the Standing Conference of Institutions of Printing Education and with other interests the possibility of giving financial assistance for the purchase of printing equipment for colleges of further education.

HOME DEPARTMENT

South Wales Police

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider allowing the South Wales police constabulary to re-introduce its cadet training scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This is a matter for the South Wales Police Authority which I understand has no plans to reintroduce a cadet force at present.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will consider increasing the South Wales police constabulary by 500 police officers during 1986-87; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to increase the level of police manpower in Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The deployment of police officers in Cardiff and other parts of South Wales is a matter for the Chief Constable. The South Wales police authority has not made an application recently for an increase in the police establishment of the force. We shall consider applications for increases in police establishments on the basis of the proven needs of the force, and in the light of advice from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary. Since May 1979 the strength of the South Wales constabulary has increased by 163 to 3,108 on 30 September 1986, and 40 additional police posts have been approved for the force.

Immigration Interviews

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provision there is for access to food and drink for those detained for considerable times awaiting immigration interview at each site of such interviews.

Mr. Waddington: Passengers who are awaiting further interview in the secondary examination area at Terminal 3 have access at all times to a free hot drinks dispensing machine. If passengers are detained over lunchtime they are taken by coach to Harmondsworth and offered a choice of hot meals. Light refreshments and fruit are provided in the secondary examination area in the early evening. Passengers who are detained overnight are offered a hot meal on arrival at the place of detention. At other ports arrangements are made to ensure that detained persons have regular access to food and drink.

Cardiff Docks (Policing)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of South Wales as to the level of policing (a) at Cardiff docks and (b) the docks' area in Cardiff in general; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of South Wales as to the level of police manning at Cardiff Wales airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constable of South Wales that on 31 December 1985 a total of 894 police officers were allocated to Cardiff Central, Cardiff Greater and Barry divisions, which are the territorial divisions in which the docks and the airport are located. These would deal with any incidents which called for the presence of police officers. There are also Special Branch officers based at Cardiff airport. Basic security duties both there and at Cardiff docks are undertaken by private security firms.

Contraband (Cardiff Docks and Airport)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of the kind and amount of contraband items being discovered by the police at Cardiff docks and Cardiff Wales airport.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The South Wales police have not been involved in the discovery of any such items.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to lay before Parliament the orders relating to section 29 of the Data Protection Act; and when he expects to announce the range of fees for subject access requests.

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend hopes to bring forward the necessary orders and regulations by the spring of next year.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to explain the procedures used within his force to identify the originator of an inquiry to the police national computer and the categories used to record the reasons for an inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hogg: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that operators of police national computer terminals in his force are required to establish the identity of persons making enquiries and, where appropriate, make a written note that this check has been carried out. Information is divulged only to those entitled to it. The categories used to record the reasons for an inquiry are:

1. Stop: where a person or vehicle is stopped in the street.
2. Process/verbal warning: where a verbal warning is to be given to a person usually for a minor traffic offence.
3. Accident: where information is sought at the scene of an accident.
4. Arrest: where a person is arrested.
5. An unattended vehicle check: where a check is made on an unattended vehicle.
6. Crime/alleged crime: where a check is made during the course of the investigation of a crime, or alleged crime.
7. Admin: major/minor process: where an administration unit is processing information relating to major or minor traffic offences.
8. Admin: general/licensing/firearms: where an administration unit is processing information relating to licensing or firearms applications.
9. Crime support unit: where information is requested from a crime support unit during the course of an investigation or during the preparation of case papers.

All enquiries are recorded under one of these categories.

Wisard Computer Recognition Systems

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details of the Wisard computer recognition systems; how the company has been paid by Her Majesty's Government for its feasibility study; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Wisard computer recognition systems were developed by a team from Brunel university to permit electronic recognition of patterns and images. The Home Office has a contract with the university to cover the cost of a demonstration of a system capable of matching photographs of faces correctly from a large database. No demonstration has taken place to date and therefore no money had been paid to the university.

Metropolitan Police (Budget and Accounts)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange to change the principal Metropolitan police budget and accounts over to an income and expenditure basis rather than receipts and payments basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The proposal to make this change will shortly be discussed at a meeting between Home Office officials and officials at the London Boroughs Association, the Association of London Authorities and the Outer London Districts Association.

Immigration Control (Heathrow)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the flight numbers, country of origination of flights, and dates of arrival at Heathrow in (a) September and (b) October from which the passengers were not allowed to disembark for immigration control reasons for (i) one to two hours, (ii) two to three hours, (iii) three to four hours, (iv) four to five hours, (v) five to six hours, (vi) six to seven hours, (vii) seven to eight hours, (viii) over eight hours; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: On 14 October there was a delay of approximately one hour in completing the disembarkation of the passengers who arrived on flight No. BG 001 from Dhaka. I am aware of no others.

Immigration Interviews

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of visitors to the United Kingdom who were detained beyond their notified time for immigration interview in (a) September and (b) October for (i) up to one hour, (ii) one to two hours, (iii) two to three hours, (iv) three to four hours (v) four to five hours, (vi) five to six hours, (vii) six to seven hours, (viii) seven to eight hours and (ix) over eight hours; and if he will break down this information by each site where these interviews took place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Passengers who need to be further interviewed on arrival are not allotted a time of interview, but are dealt with as quickly as possible according to the circumstances. The periods of delay in various individual cases are not recorded centrally and could not be provided without disproportionate cost. Passengers granted temporary admission who are asked to report for further interview are normally seen at the time notified.

Soviet Sailors

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he will take to stop Soviet sailors coming ashore at British ports without having received authorisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Under section 8 of the Immigration Act 1971 crew members are normally exempted from the provision to obtain formal permission from an immigration officer before going ashore. However, they are required to leave the port with the ship and the master is required to provide a crew list and to report any deserters. These provisions apply to non-British crew members of all nationalities. Soviet ships are visited by immigration officers for the purpose of checking crews.

BBC Television

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any plans to reconsider the introduction of advertising on British Broadcasting Corporation television channels; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he proposes to phase out the television licence fee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are still considering the recommendations made by the Committee on Financing the BBC, and intend to give the House a fuller account very shortly of the way in which we are approaching these matters.

Fines

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total amount of money collected in fines throughout Great Britain in 1985; and what part of the total related to motoring or traffic offences.

Mr. Hurd: In 1985, £129,771 million was collected by courts in England and Wales largely in fines, though a small element was fees. I understand from my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Scotland, and the Lord Advocate, that the fines collected in Scotland amounted to £10,876 million. These totals are not analysed by type of offence.

Visas

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for regional passport and inquiry offices to accept written applications from those wishing to apply for visa exemption stamps.

Mr. Waddington: No. It is more economical to have only a single address for postal applications.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for immigration officers at ports to stamp visa exemption stamps in the passports of those eligible for such stamps as they leave the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Passengers whose passports have not been stamped to show that they are exempt from a visa requirement either on entry or while in this country may obtain exempt endorsements on departure where adequate arrangements can be made to establish exemption.

Visitors (Indian Subcontinent)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors from (a) India, (b) Bangladesh and (c) Pakistan, during the period 1 September to 15 October 1986 have been allowed admission to the United Kingdom pending interviews with immigration officials at Leeds/Bradford airport; and how many of them have been granted visitor status.

Mr. Waddington: The information available, shown in the table, relates to passengers from the three countries who were required to submit to further examination and whose cases have been transferred to Leeds/Bradford airport from Heathrow between the dates given:

	Granted temporary admission	Given leave to enter
India	35	2
Bangladesh	33	1
Pakistan	93	5
Totals	161	8

Decisions have not yet been made in about 100 cases still awaiting interviews.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the number of prisoners at H.M. prison, Hull on (a) 4 June 1985, (b) 7 November 1985 and (c) 7 November 1986.

(2) what was the number of prisoners at H.M. prison, Leeds on (a) 4 June 1985; (b) 7 November 1985 and (c) 7 November 1986; (3) what action he proposes to relieve the present overcrowding at H.M. prison, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally only once a week. The population of HM prisons Hull and Leeds on the nearest dates for which information is available centrally was as follows:

	Hull	Leeds
7 June 1985	283	1,328
8 November 1985	294	1,267
7 November 1986	572	1,322

Significant relief was provided to Leeds by the conversion of HM prison Hull from a dispersal prison to a local prison on 22 February 1986. There is little scope for any further immediate large scale relief to Leeds. In the longer term, however, the construction of some 450 additional places at Leeds and of a new local prison at Doncaster will provide substantial relief in this area.

BBC (Governors)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the occupations of each of the governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Mellor: The details are as follows:

Mr. M. J. Hussey
BBC Chairman, formerly chief executive and managing director of Times Newspapers.
Lord Bernett
Accountant, formerly Chief Secretary to the Treasury, formerly Chairman, Public Accounts Committee, MP for Heywood and Royton 1964-1983

Sir Curtis Keeble GCMG
Former member of HM diplomatic service.

Bus Lanes (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide additional resources to the Commissioner of Police to enable him to devote greater resources to policing bus lanes in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend announced last May increases of up to 1,200 in the Metropolitan police establishment over four years. The deployment of this additional manpower will be a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Brent Magistrates' Court

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the precise date for the start on site for the building of the new Brent magistrates' courthouse; and what is the proposed completion date.

Mr. Mellor: This is for the London Borough of Brent but we understand that building is expected to start early in 1987 and finish in 1989.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are for the future use of the present Brent magistrates' court building on the completion of the building of the new courthouse.

Mr. Mellor: This is a matter for the London Borough of Brent in consultation with the magistrates' courts committee, but we understand that no decision has yet been made on the future use of the present court building.

Immigrants (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report the applications he has received for funding of posts under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 since he issued Circular 72/1986; and if he will state against each application, where appropriate, his reasons for not granting section 11 funding.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is set out in the following table. In a small number of other cases applications not made on the proper form have been returned to the local authority.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

North Sea (Chemical Spillage)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to monitor the impact in the North sea of the toxic chemical spillage from the Sandoz factory in Switzerland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Sheep

Mr. Hirst asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to ban the tooth grinding of sheep.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Following advice from the Farm Animal Welfare Council, the Government recently announced their agreement to a ban on the teeth grinding of sheep. We expect that regulations to bring this into effect will be laid before Parliament during December.

ENVIRONMENT

Estate Agents

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will review the level of fines which may be imposed under section 109 of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1984, with special reference to the use of estate agents' boards in residential areas; and whether he is satisfied that the maximum fines permitted provide a sufficient deterrent.

Mr. Tracey: The maximum fine on summary conviction of an offence under section 109(2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 is prescribed at "level 3" on the standard scale of penalties (current £400), which is regularly reviewed by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in accordance with the provisions of section 46 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982. The maximum daily penalty for a continuing offence under section 109(2) of the 1971 Act is increased from £20 to £40 by virtue of provisions in the Housing and Planning Act 1986, which will be brought into force shortly. We have no plans for a further increase of the daily penalty at present. It is for local planning authorities to decide whether to prosecute offenders.

Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to fill the existing vacancy in the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission.

Mr. Waldegrave: The National Heritage Act 1983 provides for the appointment of not more than 17 members to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. At present there are 14 members. Ministers regularly review the pattern and timing of appointments with the commission's chairman; I shall be doing so very shortly.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to collect information in the same form as the Audit Commission used in its report, "Managing the Crisis in Council Housing", on the numbers of empty local authority dwellings which are available for letting.

Mr. John Patten: As the Audit Commission made clear in the report to which the hon. Member refers, the information on empty local authority dwellings which the commission quoted was collected by the Department from local authorities. Authorities include this in their annual housing investment programme returns.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his latest estimate of the percentage of empty dwellings in (a) private sector, (b) public sector, (c) those owned and controlled by Her Majesty's Government and (d) housing associations;

(2) if he will publish from the local authorities housing investment returns for 1 April the number and percentage of vacant dwellings in the local authority housing associations, other public sectors and the private sector, giving totals for each region.

Mr. John Patten: The available estimates for April 1986, derived from English local authorities' housing investment programme returns, are as follows:

Vacant dwellings, England: April 1986

	Local authorities	Housing associations	Other public sector	Private sector	All sectors

England	111·6(2·5)	14·9(3·2)	18·5(6·6)	552(4·1)	697(3·7)

Notes:

In addition local authorities owned 1,700 further dwellings which were closed making a total of 113,300.

The "other public sector" figures in this case include local authorities' overspill estates, in addition to housing owned by new towns, county councils (for example police houses), Government Departments and nationalised industries and other public agencies. Many of these dwellings are vacant because of operational requirements, notably those owned by the Ministry of Defence, and others have been acquired for demolition, for example by the Department of Transport. The Government are encouraging the sale of housing which is not required and many of those that are vacant are in the process of disposal.

Housing associations' acquisitions of dwellings for rehabilitation inflate the numbers which are vacant.

Vacant dwellings in the private sector include those which are in severe disrepair, those undergoing renovation or awaiting demolition, those which are empty while being sold or between lettings, and those whose owners do not wish to occupy or sell them but are deterred from letting by the Rent Act.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the time local housing authorities take in reletting vacant dwellings.

Mr. John Patten: The Department does not collect this information.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list for the 50 English housing authorities owning the highest numbers of empty dwellings, the numbers of such dwellings which are closed awaiting demolition or renovation and those known to be used as temporary homes for tenants whose own home is being modernised;

(2) if he will list the 50 housing authorities owning the highest numbers of empty dwellings, giving the figures and an indication of how many of these dwellings have been empty for (a) more than one year and (b) more than two years.

Mr. John Patten: The 50 English local authorities which, in their housing investment programme returns, reported owning the largest numbers of vacant dwellings (including those which were closed) at 1 April 1986 are as follows, with an analysis of those awaiting demolition, repair or improvement. Information on numbers held vacant for use by tenants whose homes are being modernised is not available.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the totals for England of each aspect of housing need appraisal listed on the numerical statement sent by housing authorities to his Department on form DOE 16314 for 1986 in the same form as he used in his answer of 15 January, Official Report, columns 573-76.

Mr. John Patten: Totals for England, including estimates where figures were missing, for each of the items in local authorities 1986 housing needs appraisal statement (HIPI) are as follows:

Local authorities' figures for housing not in their ownership are not usually based on detailed surveys and they are, therefore, less firm. Also, local authorities' criteria for some items might differ: for example, on unfitness, for which the totals are not consistent with the results of the English house condition survey.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has for each housing authority in England as to the number of dwellings classed as difficult to let, including the percentage this figure represents of the local authority owned stock; and what are the changes in these figures since 1985.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities' annual housing investment programme returns include numbers of dwellings owned within their own areas, which they class as difficult to let. Numbers reported are not necessarily comparable as authorities' criteria may differ. The total for England at 1 April 1986, including estimates for those councils which did not provide a figure, was about 325,000, 7·3 per cent. of the stock, and was 4,000 greater than the estimate for a year earlier. The figures for each authority are as follows:

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report for each English housing authority (a) the stock, (b) the number of unfit dwellings, (c) the number of dwellings fit but lacking basic amenities and (d) the numbers of non-substandard dwellings in need of renovation, indicating in each case the percentage of total stock affected; and if this number is higher or lower than at the same date in 1985.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities' housing investment programme returns for 1985 and 1986 included their estimates of defective dwellings in their areas at 1 April each year. Numbers reported are not necessarily comparable as authorities' criteria may differ and in total they are not consistent with estimates from the English house condition survey of 1981. The figures requested are as follows:

Defective dwellings; England April 1986

Caravan Act 1980

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is issued by his Department about whether organisations exempt from planning permission by virtue of the Caravan Act 1980 should consult informally with planning authorities before they issue exemption certificates; and how many exemption certificates were issued in each of the last five years.

Mr. Waldegrave: Exemption certificates are issued by the Secretary of State under the powers in paragraph 12 of the first schedule to the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, for the purposes of paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of that schedule. Only four organisations are permitted to use their certificates for all three purposes, and these have been advised to give local planning authorities prior notice of their proposals for approving certificated sites under paragraph 5. There is full consultation by these four organisations with local planning authorities before the setting up of managed sites under paragraph 4, but caravan rallying under paragraph 6 is not normally subject to such consultation.

According to our records the total numbers of certificated sites approved under paragraph 5 in each of the past five years are:

	Numbers
1982	4,602
1983	5,058
1984	5,488
1985	5,493
1986	5,965

Toxic Waste

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the number of occasions in each of the past five years when his Department was made aware of toxic waste spillage.

Mr. Waldegrave: There have been a few occasions when my Department has become aware of toxic waste spillage over the past five years, but there is no requirement for such notification to be made, nor are central records kept.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has monitored the number of redundancy claims and the payments made to date by the residuary bodies set up following abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Chope: Yes. The Department receives periodic returns from the residuary bodies on the totals of redundancy claims and compensation payments.

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to lay before Parliament the 1985-86 annual reports and statements of accounts of the residuary bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The residuary bodies' 1985-86 annual reports and statements of accounts were laid before Parliament today. These set out the activities and financial position of each residuary body for the period between their establishment by order under section 57 of the Local Government Act 1985 and 31 March 1986.

This was a difficult period for the residuary bodies and all credit is due to them for the effectiveness with which they carried out their duties in the run-up to abolition. The smooth transition of functions from the abolished authorities to their successors in no small part reflects the dedicated efforts of these small teams.

Sulphur Dioxide

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the most recent figures available for sulphur dioxide emissions (in millions tonnes) from the USSR, United Kingdom, Italy, East Germany, West Germany and France.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 47.]: Following are estimates for 1983, the latest year for which comparable figures are available as total emissions, expressed in millions of tonnes of sulphur dioxide, and per capita emissions, expressed in kilos per capita:

	million tonnes
Total emissions
USSR	12·00
United Kingdom	3·69
Italy	3·80
East Germany	4·00
West Germany	2·75
France	2·03

	Kilos per capita
Per capita emissions
USSR	—
United Kingdom	66
Italy	67
East Germany	239
West Germany	45
France	37

The figure for the USSR applies only to that part of the country which lies inside the monitoring grid of the UN-ECE co-operative programme for the monitoring and evaluation of the long-range transmission of air pollution in Europe (EMEP), and so it is not possible to calculate per capita emissions.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Higher Education

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of school leavers have taken up places in higher education at the latest date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: Provisional information for 1985 indicates that the age participation index for higher education in Great Britain was 13·9. The age participation index is the number of home initial entrants, aged less than 21, expressed as a percentage of the "relevant age group". This represents a significant and welcome increase from the API of 12·4 in 1979.

Latin and Greek

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what assessment he has made of the role of Latin and Greek teaching within the school curriulum;

(2) what steps he is taking to promote the study of Latin and Greek in secondary schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: In England and Wales, arrangements for the teaching of classical languages are the responsibility of local education auhorities and schools themselves. The value of the study of Latin and Greek was recognised in the draft policy statement "Foreign Languages in the School Curriculum", published earlier this year by the Department and the Welsh Office. This suggested that, when Latin and Greek are made available in schools, they should, like second foreign languages, be provided as options for pupils who have shown linguistic ability; and that it may be appropriate for such pupils to study both a second foreign language and a classical language as part of their general language development.

The draft statement called upon authorities and schools to prepare and implement clear and positive policies for their provision of foreign languages. Following consultations on the draft, a final version of the statement will be issued.

Science and Engineering Research Council

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how much the fall in sterling against European currencies and the dollar has affected the amount of subscriptions payable by the science and engineering research council to international organisations.

Mr. Walden: The predicted increase in subscriptions payable by SERC to international organisations in the financial year 1987-88 due to the fall in sterling against European currencies between October 1985 and October 1986 (average rates) is £17·84 million. There are no payments by SERC to international organisations in dollars.

Dissection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will ensure that all students wishing to undertake officially approved examinations are not required against their will to perform animal dissection work; whether he is prepared to make representation to the examination boards urging the use of alternatives to dissection; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: In December 1985 the GCE boards issued a joint statement which said that they do not require dissection of whole animals in courses below sixth form level. It is widely considered by teachers that educational benefits accrue from including limited dissection in A level biology courses, and the boards' requirements reflect this. In the Government's view, decisions about the detailed content of the school curriculum, including dissection, should be taken at local level. It is for those concerned to take into account differing opinions on this sensitive matter, and to consider possible alternatives to dissection.

In the case of students on courses in further and higher education, it is for the relevant academic and professional authorities to consider whether dissection should be a necessary element.

Medical Education

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what his plans are for the future level of spending on medical education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend announced on 6 November, Official Report, at column 490, the Government's decision to provide an additional £61 million for recurrent and equipment grant for the universities in the financial year 1987-88 compared with previously planned expenditure and a corresponding addition of £71 million in 1988-89. This will allow increased expenditure on medical education, but how much will depend on decisions by individual universities and the University Grants Committee.

O and A-level

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what have been the trends since 1956 in the proportion of children in the relevant age group who achieve at least (a) one O-level pass or equivalent, (b) one A-level pass, (c) five or more O-level passes and (d) three or more A-level passes.

Mr. Dunn: Statistics for the years 1960--61 to 1984-85 are shown below. Data for earlier years are not available on a consistent basis.

[1] England and Wales for 1960-61 and 1961-62.

[2] From 1974-75 O level grades A-C, CSE grade 1. Prior to 1974-75 O level examinations were graded pass or fail. CSE examinations introduced from and for, summer 1965.

[3] The raising of the school leaving age in 1973 affected the total number of school leavers, which was unusually low in 1972-73. Percentages are therefore unrepresentative and have been omitted.

Mature Students

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will publish a list which shows the subjects studied by mature students in higher education in each of the past three years.

Mr. Walden: In 1983, and in 1984 with the exception of agricultural chemistry, there were acceptances by mature students through the Universities Central Council on admissions in each of the standard 76 subject groups as shown in list 1 following.

The new classification of university courses was introduced in 1985 and there were acceptances by mature students in all subject groups as shown in list 2 except other mathematical sciences and combinations within Group X.

There were mature first year students in public sector higher education, in England, in all the subjects shown in list 3 except for chemical technology, Welsh and other celtic languages, other central and eastern European languages and classical studies in 1983, 1984 and 1985. Additionally, in 1984 and 1985 there were none in archaeology.

Higher Education

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in (a) part-time and (b) full-time higher education in each of the past 10 years were of (i) Asian and (ii) Afro-Caribbean origin; and what percentages of all such students these figures represent.

Mr. Walden: This information is not collected centrally. Discussions are in progress within the Department about means of collecting such data for the future.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in (a) part-time and (b) full-time higher education were registered as physically handicapped in each of the past 10 years; and what percentages of all students in higher education these figures represent.

Mr. Walden: Information on physically handicapped students in higher education is not collected centrally on a routine basis. In 1985 a survey of students with special educational needs was carried out. It covered public sector higher education and non-advanced further education in England. The survey estimated that some 600 students in public sector higher education were recorded as having special educational needs which require additional support or equipment provided by the college. This represents around 15 per 10,000 students in public sector higher education. Almost half of these students had physical or sensory handicaps.

The survey also estimated that there were around 44,000 students with special educational needs in English further education. A full report of the survey findings will be published by the National Bureau of Handicapped Students in early 1987. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

The Open university had just over 2,000 disabled students (3 per cent. of all students) in the undergraduate programme at the start of 1986. There were also 150 disabled associate students (1·5 per cent. of all students). There were similar numbers of disabled students in 1984 and 1985.

School Meals

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by education authority (a) the most recently available number of school pupils receiving free school meals, (b) the numbers receiving free school meals as a percentage of the school population, (c) the average number of pupils receiving free school meals during the academic year 1978-79 and (d) the average numbers receiving free school meals expressed as a percentage of the average school population during the academic year 1978-79.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 15-16]: The information available is shown below, based on the October school meals census data for 1978 and for 1984, the latest date for which information is available. Free pupil meals take-up is expressed as a percentage of the total number of children in school on the day for the census.

Average figures for meals take-up throughout the year are not available.

Notes:

1. Free school meals are available on either of two bases:
   (a) Statutory: to children from families in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement.
   (b) Discretionary: Under the Education Act 1980, LEAs have powers to provide free or reduced cost school meals if they consider it appropriate. Low income scales and other criteria qualifying children for free meals may vary from year to year and from one LEA to another. Prior to 1980, income scales were laid down by the Secretary of State in regulations.
2. The free meal pupil number total for England in 1984 includes an estimate for St. Helens as the authority was unable to complete a census return for 1984.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Terrorism

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many citizens from within European Economic Community countries have died over the past five years as a result of terrorists on land, sea and in the air; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Our records show that 821 European Community citizens have died as a result of terrorism over the past five years (November 1981 to November 1986). 400 of these were United Kingdom citizens, of whom 381 were killed within the United Kingdom and 19 elsewhere in the world.

We and our other European Community partners have repeatedly condemned the use of terrorism and have taken wide-ranging measures to deter terrorists and their sponsors and to improve counter terrorist co-operation.

Syria and Libya (Trade)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on which European Economic Community countries are trading with Syria and Libya in military, industrial, agricultural and technical equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In their declaration of 27 January 1986, the Foreign Ministers of the Twelve agreed not to export arms or other military equipment to countries which are clearly implicated in supporting terrorism. On 14 April the Foreign Ministers made it clear that no arms or military equipment would be exported to Libya. On 10 November they agreed to apply the same restrictions to Syria. The Twelve have not sought to impose any ban on trade with Libya or Syria in non-military equipment.

Implementing Powers

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's response to the Commission of the European Communities' proposal for a Council regulation laying down procedures for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission.

Mrs. Chalker: We recognise the need to rationalise the wide variety of procedures at present in use for supervising the implementation of Council decisions. The United Kingdom and other member states have made it clear that any new arrangements must enable the Council to exercise adequate control over the implementation of its decisions. Any change to the existing procedures will require unanimous agreement.

Trade Boycotts

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations have been received by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) advocating European legislation to prevent discriminatory trade boycotts which do not have international sanction; what reply has been sent; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received letters on 17 September and 22 October 1986 from the chairman of the Anti-Boycott Co-ordination Committee of the British-Israel Chamber of Commerce, to which I replied on 29 September and 30 October respectively: there is no consensus within the European Community in favour of such legislation.

Economic and Social Committee

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the United Kingdom members of the Economic and Social Committee of the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Kingdom members of the Economic and Social Committee are listed in alphabetical order. They were sworn in for a four-year term on 21 October.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make representations to the Soviet Union regarding (a) the jamming of western Russian language broadcasts and (b) the arrests of 41 members of the Helsinki monitoring group; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if his Department has taken any steps to persuade the Soviet Union to allow gift parcels to be sent to relatives and friends in the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: All these issues are of great concern to us, and have been raised with the Soviet authorities bilaterally and in the CSCE framework. The United Kingdom tabled a proposal on interference with postal communications at the Berne experts meeting on human contacts earlier this year. At the Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting, now under way, our delegation has already raised in debate Soviet jamming of BBC broadcasts and the imprisonment of Helsinki monitoring groups. We will be arranging for copies of major speeches by our CSCE delegation to be deposited in the Library.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Soviet Foreign Minister Mr. Shevardnadze; what issues were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend met Mr. Shervardnadze on 4 November in Vienna. They had a full discussion of the way forward in arms control after the Reykjavik meeting. My right hon. and learned Friend also raised human rights and contacts and urged the Soviet Union to take a responsible attitude to terrorism.

Helsinki Agreement

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make representations to the Soviet Union on human rights balance implementation of the Helsinki agreement; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has made to the Soviet Union regarding human rights in the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will consider asking the Soviet Union to allow relatives in the Soviet Union to visit their relatives in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he discussed the issue of reunification of divided families with Mr. Shevardnadze, the Soviet Foreign Minister; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We attach the greatest importance to securing Soviet improvements to human rights and human contacts, including family reunification, and raise these matters frequently with the Soviet authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend discussed them with Mr. Shevardnadze in Vienna on 4 November. The Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting, now under way, will provide further opportunities to press the Soviet Union to live up to all its commitments under the Helsinki Final Act and Madrid concluding document.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make representations to the Soviet Union on verification for compliance with the human rights provision of the 1975 Helsinki agreement; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider seeking the appointment of a special human rights panel which would have the right to visit all parts of the Soviet Union to check compliance with the Helsinki agreement on human rights; and will he make a statement;

(3) if he will consider making representations to the Soviet Union towards accepting the verification plan on human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We will look closely at any new initiatives for verifying compliance with human rights commitments, including those referred to by my hon. Friend, in the context of the Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting, but it is our aim to hold a thorough debate at Vienna on the implementation of existing commitments before turning to new ideas.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on export of chemicals from European Economic Community countries to the middle east or the African states that can be used for military purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to chemicals which have legitimate civil uses but which are also capable of being used to manufacture lethal chemical agents. Following the confirmation of the use of chemical weapons in the Gulf conflict in 1984, the 12 members of the European Community have imposed export controls on certain chemicals which are so capable. In the United Kingdom, I understand that some 20 licences have been granted by the Department of Trade and industry for destinations in Africa or the middle east. We have been satisfied that these exports have been for legitimate purposes. I am not in a position to provide information on exports from other Community countries.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any information on the use by any Warsaw pact countries of chemical weapons over the past six years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Soviet Union has been associated with reports of use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan and areas of south east Asia under Communist Governments. A summary of the evidence is in the United States Department of State special report No. 98 dated 2 March 1982, a copy of which has been deposited in the Library.

Iran

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current policy towards relations with Iran.

Mr. Renton: We are well aware of the strategic, political and economic importance of Iran, a country with which we have had a long historical relationship. We have followed closely the events in Iran since the Islamic revolution in 1979. We respect the right of the Iranian people to have the form of government of their choosing. We remain critical of the Iranian Government's record on human rights and respect for other international conventions. Nevertheless, we stand ready to build a more constructive and businesslike relationship with Iran in the future based on mutual interests.

We are scrupulously impartial towards the Iran-Iraq conflict and urge both sides to engage in negotiations to bring the tragic fighting there to an early and peaceful end. Our policy on arms supplies has been progressively tightened, and will remain that we refuse to sell defence equipment to either Iran or Iraq which will significantly enhance their capability to prolong or exacerbate the conflict. The detailed guidelines were set out in the answer that my right hon. and learned Friend gave to the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) on 29 October 1985, at column 454.

Falklands Fisheries

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the licensing procedures and conditions for fishing within the Falkland Islands conservation zone will be the same for all countries wishing to obtain licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The fisheries regulations and licensing conditions will be published shortly by the Falkland Islands Government. Licences to fish will be granted by the FIG in accordance with conservation requirements.

Reykjavik Summit

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the progress made by President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev at their meeting in Reykjavik; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Reykjavik meeting was one step on the long road of improving East-West relations in general and in reaching arms control agreements in particular. We hope that the two sides negotiating at the Geneva nuclear and space talks will now be able to build on the progress made there in particular on INF and on the proposal for a 50 per cent. reduction in United States and Soviet strategic offensive nuclear arsenals.

East-West Relations

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiative he proposes to take on East-West relations, after the mini-summit meeting in Reykjavik; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has just returned from important consultations with President Reagan. She is also in correspondence with Mr. Gorbachev; both she and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary have accepted invitations to visit Moscow next year. At the Vienna follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe we are pressing, with other Western countries, for real improvements in Eastern performance on human rights and other issues.

Arms Control

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he is contemplating for verification of nuclear and conventional arms control agreements with the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom is not a party to the Geneva nuclear and space talks, but we fully support the United States proposals that agreements on reductions in INF and START should provide for adequate verification including on-site inspection where necessary.

Allied policy on all aspects of conventional arms control is currently being studied within the NATO high level task force set up at the Halifax ministerial meeting last May. At the mutual and balanced force reductions talks the current Western proposals, which provide for the verification of both reductions and the resultant levels of conventional forces in central Europe, was a United Kingdom initiative. In Stockholm, at the Conference on Disarmament in Europe (CDE), we had prime responsibility within the Western group for the successful negotiations of detailed measures providing for on-site inspection: the first such measures in an arms control agreement.

We have taken a number of verification initiatives in the negotiations for a chemical weapons ban. We will be continuing to discuss these with the Soviet Union, but we will be pressing in particular for agreement on a recent British initiative on the most crucial verification issue of challenge inspection.

Chernobyl Disaster

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest information he has on the effects of the Chernobyl disaster in the Ukraine.

Mr. Renton: Recent statements by Ukranian Ministers have confirmed that the situation in most of the Ukraine is returning to normal. Only in areas directly bordering the 30 km zone around the power station are levels of gamma radiation higher than normal, and these levels are falling steadily. Monitoring has revealed that residual radioactivity in foodstuffs is giving no cause for concern and that the water supply is unaffected. The Soviet authorities have said that the situation is under control everywhere and that everything is being done to ensure the safety and to protect the health of the population.

Falklands Fisheries

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Falkland Islands Government are to take to seek to ensure that at all times at least one of their civilian fisheries protection vessels is on station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: A director of fisheries, who will be resident, will co-ordinate the operations of a surveillance aircraft and two civilian fisheries protection vessels to provide the necessary monitoring of the zone (FICZ).

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions are taking place with the Government of Argentina concerning Argentine vessels fishing within the Falkland Islands fisheries conservation zone; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We remain ready to discuss with Argentina and other interested Governments the best way of conserving fish stocks in the South Atlantic and continue to believe that a multilateral solution is the best way forward.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Falkland Islands Fisheries (Conservation and Management) Ordinance 1986 is (a) to be published, (b) to be enacted and (c) to come into force.

Mr. Eggar: The Falkland Islands Fisheries (Conservation and Management) Ordinance 1986 was published and enacted on 12 November 1986. The ordinance

"shall come into force on such a day as the Governor shall appoint by Order published in the Gazette and the Governor may appoint different days for the coming into force of different provisions".

Copies of the text of the Ordinance are being placed in the Library of the House.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements the Falkland Islands Government are making for the trying of offences under the Falkland Islands Fisheries (Conservation and Management) Ordinance 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Under the terms of the Falkland Islands Fisheries (Conservation and Management) Ordinance 1986 it is for the summary court or the magistrates court to try offences. However, the Ordinance also makes provision for the imposition of administrative penalties for minor offences.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Falkland Islands Government will be fully responsible for negotiations with the European Commission over fishing in the Falkland Islands conservation zone; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Negotiations with the European Commission on Falklands matters are the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government.

Entry Clearance (Fee)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions he has issued to British posts overseas concerning the need for those applying for entry clearance to the United Kingdom to submit the appropriate fee with the application, that the application is not considered lodged until the fee is paid; if such instructions are in line with the recommendation made by the Home Affairs Committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Instructions were issued to all entry clearance posts at the time a fee was introduced for entry certificates. Posts were instructed to collect the appropriate fee with the application which, without a fee, is not considered lodged. The second report of the Home Affairs Committee on "Immigration from the Indian Subcontinent" made no recommendation concerning fees.

Falkland Islands (Penguin carcases)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to receive the report on the Falkland Islands penguin carcases from the veterinary investigation centre.

Mr. Eggar: The veterinary investigation centre provided a copy of its summary of findings prepared for the Falkland Islands Foundation on 13 August. It added nothing of significance to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) on 3 July, at column 640.

Hungarian Freedom Fighters Association

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about recent official contacts with the British branch of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters Association.

Mr. Renton: The president of the British branch of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters Association wrote last month to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to express the thanks of members of the association for the practical help given by the British Government and people to members of the association after the Hungarian uprising of 1956. In her reply, the Prime Minister expressed her appreciation. She drew attention to the public statement that I made on 24 October in connection with the anniversary of the uprising, and the appeal issued earlier the same week by over 100 individuals in various countries of central and eastern Europe, which stressed the need for greater freedom and openness.

Commonwealth Institute

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy review of the Commonwealth Institute.

Mr. Eggar: I have received the report of the review team and have placed a copy in the Library of the House. The Government are considering the report and look forward to discussing its recommendations with the governors and senior staff at the Commonwealth Institute.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Abortions

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the numbers of National Health Service abortions, and of non-National Health Service abortions, performed in England and Wales on women resident in each health area in Northern Ireland in 1984 and 1985 and the estimated numbers of women aged 15 to 44 years resident in each health area in 1984.

Mr. Needham: Information on abortions carried out in England and Wales to non-residents, including those from Northern Ireland, is to be found in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys publication "Abortion Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. The estimated number of women aged 15 to 44 years resident in each Health and Social Services Board area in 1984 is as follows:

	Number
Eastern	134,300
Northern	81,800
Southern	59,400
Western	53,200
Northern Ireland Total	328,700

SOCIAL SERVICES

Unemployed Persons (Cost)

88. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total cost in benefits and lost tax and national insurance payments of those who are currently unemployed.

Mr. Major: The cost of paying benefit to unemployed people in 1986-87 is estimated to be £6,750 million. Of that total £1,150 million represents housing benefit, a benefit which can continue to be paid to people who are in work. It is not possible to make a sensible estimate of the revenue, including national insurance contributions, forgone because of the number of variables that could affect this.

Children at Risk (Register)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the number of children placed on the at-risk register in England and Wales, separately distinguishing alleged or suspected (a) physical and (b) sexual abuse, for the most recently available date;

(2) what guidelines his Department issues to Social Services departments regarding the calling of case conferences in cases of alleged or suspected sexual abuse and whether to place children subjected to sexual abuse on the at-risk register.

Mr. Newton: Information about the number of children placed on at-risk registers in England and Wales is not held centrally. Draft guidance called "Working together for the protection of children", was issued to Social Services departments on 6 May 1986 and includes advice on the calling of case conferences and the placement of vulnerable children on at-risk registers (or child protection registers). We expect to issue guidance in the spring.

Child Care Law (Review)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether Her Majesty's Government have completed their consideration of the responses to the "Child Care Law Review" consultative document published in September 1985; whether it has been decided to seek to legislate to assist young people leaving care with housing difficulties; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Government have considered the comments received in response to the consultative document "Review of Child Care Law" and intend to publish their proposals for legislation shortly.

Unemployment (Mortgage Interest)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether Her Majesty's Government will now abandon the proposal not to meet mortgage interest payments in full in the first six months of unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member, on 21 October at column 859.

Jobstart Allowances

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether people who accept low paid employment with the intention of applying for jobstart allowances, but who are subsequently refused the allowance, are liable to have their supplementary benefit reduced under regulation 8 of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations if they leave the job as a result of being refused the jobstart allowance; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: In law, a person who voluntarily leaves a job without just cause is disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit for up to 13 weeks. Any supplementary benefit that he may be entitled to is reduced under regulation 8 of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations for the same period. Whether a person has just cause for leaving his employment is a question for the independent adjudication authorities who have regard to any reasons that the person advances. Whether refusal of jobstart allowances was just cause for leaving a job would be decided by those authorities in the circumstances of the individual case.

Population Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people in Wales are living at or below the basic supplementary benefit levels in Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(2) what percentage of the population of Wales are living at or below the basic supplementary benefit levels; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the change in the number and population of people in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, between 1979 and 1986;

(4) how many people of pensionable age in Wales are living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(5) what proportion of those people of pensionable age in Wales are living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(6) what has been the change in number, and proportion, of people of pensionable age in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, between 1979 and 1986;

(7) how many people below pensionable age in Wales are living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(8) what proportion of those people in Wales below pensionable age are living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(9) what has been the change in the number and proportion of people below pensionable age, who live on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, in the years between 1979 and 1986;

(10) how many people living on or below the basic supplementary benefits levels, in Wales, live in households which contain one or more full-time wage earners;

(11) what proportion of people living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, in Wales, live in households which contain one or more full-time wage earners;

(12) what proportion of the people below pensionable age living on or below the basic supplementary benefits levels, in Wales, live in households which contain one or more full-time wage earners;

(13) of the people below pensionable age in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, what proportion live in households where there are dependent children;

(14) of the people below pensionable age in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels, how many live in households where there are dependent children;

(15) how many of the people in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels are children; and what proportion they represent of (a) the total number of people in Wales living on or below basic supplementary benefit levels and (b) the total number of people below pensionable age in Wales living on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels;

(16) how many families with children in Wales live on or below the basic supplementary benefit levels.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 6 November at column 584.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people are claiming supplementary benefit in Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979;

(2) what was the increase in the number of people claiming supplementary benefit in Wales between 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Lyell: The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit in Wales in February 1986, the latest available figures, and at a comparable date in each year since 1979 are given in the table. The increase in numbers between 1979 and 1986 was 108,000, a rise of 59·3 per cent.

Year	Numbers
1980	170,000
1981	195,000
1982	229,000
1983	255,000
1984[1]	271,000
1985	279,000
1986	290,000

[1] Figures for August 1984 have been given because no information is available for February of that year.
Source: Supplementary Benefit Quarterly Statistical Enquiry rounded to nearest 1,000.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the people living in Wales depend on supplementary benefit; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lyell: The table shows the proportion of people living in Wales dependent upon supplementary benefit in December 1984, the latest available figures, and on comparable dates since 1979.

Year	Per cent.
1979	9·5
1980	10·3
1981	13·1
1982	15·2
1983	15·6
1984	16·8

Source: Supplementary Benefit Annual Statistical Enquiry and population data from the Welsh Office.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many families in Wales have incomes below the tax threshold; and what proportion of these are working families.

Mr. Major: I regret that the statistics cannot be broken down reliably in the manner requested.

AIDS

Sir Gerard Vaughan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will announce urgently when he will commence distributing the leaflets on acquired immune deficiency syndrome to the general public; whether the leaflet is ready for printing; and what information he has as to whether the General Post Office is willing and prepared to start distribution as soon as asked.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

SCOTLAND

Licensing Laws

89. Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department has made a study of the effects of the liberalisation of the licensing laws in Scotland on tourism north of the border.

Mr. Lang: No, but in the recently issued consultative document on possible further relaxations in the licensing laws the Scottish Tourist Board is among those who have been asked for views.

Latin and Greek

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what steps he is taking to promote the study of Latin and Greek in secondary schools;

(2) what assessment he has made of the role of Latin and Greek teaching within the school curriculum.

Mr. John MacKay: I fully recognise the value of Latin and Greek in the development of linguistic and literary skills in pupils who have the necessary aptitude. A standard grade course in Latin has been introduced this year for first examination in 1988 and a national development officer has been appointed to help provide support for it. It is intended that there should also in due course be a standard grade course in Greek.

More generally, the Consultative Committee on the Curriculum is currently considering what advice might be given to education authorities on the place of Latin and Greek in the secondary school curriculum in the context of a forthcoming policy statement on the teaching of languages other than English. I hope that the CCC's advice will be helpful to authorities, which are responsible for decisions on the provision of these subjects in the light of the continuing fall in demand for them from pupils and of the availability of resources.

Balvaird Castle, Glenfarg

Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what public funds have been spent on Balvaird castle, Glenfarg; in whose ownership the building is; and what use is proposed for it.

Mr. Ancram: Balvaird castle, which is owned by the Earl of Mansfield, came into the guardianship of the Secretary of State in 1974. Since then a total of £1·1 million has been spent on a programme of works to restore it to a condition in which it could safety be opened to the public. It is proposed in due course to do so on the same basis as other monuments.

Food (Radioactivity)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements are being made to control the importation into Scotland of foodstuffs containing radioactive contamination following the expiry on 30 September of the European Economic Community Council regulation No. 1707/86.

Mr. John MacKay: The arrangements for the control of the importation into Scotland of such foodstuffs have been extended to 28 February 1987 in accordance with EC Regulation No. 3020/86.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the maximum levels of caesium 134/137 which would be found during 1987 in milk and meat produced from cattle fed during the coming winter on hay or silage contaminated by these radionuclides at the maximum levels of 1,145Bq/Kg and 454Bq/Kg, respectively, found in his Department's recent monitoring.

Mr. Ancram: The radioactivity which will be present in meat and milk produced in 1987 will come in part from that in hay and silage used for cattle feed this winter. It is not possible to predict exactly what contribution radioactivity in winter feed will make to the total present in milk and meat next year. However, monitoring will continue of all materials of potential significance in terms of public health.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the maximum level of caesium 134/137 which would be found in (a) cow's milk, (b) beef and (c) lamb's meat produced from animals grazing on pasture contaminated by these radionuclides at the maximum level of 7,030Bq/sq m found in recent monitoring by his Department.

Mr. Ancram: No such assessment has been made. The monitoring of pasture was not undertaken in order to predict levels of radioactivity in cow's milk, beef and lamb's meat, but rather to help to identify those areas where further monitoring of agricultural products might be needed.

Housing

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of houses in Glasgow still below tolerable standard; and what additional funds will be made available towards area renewal.

Mr. Ancram: Glasgow district council reported 11,452 houses below the tolerable standard at 31 March 1986. This compares with 37,939 in 1979. My right hon. and learned Friend has not yet reached a decision on how available resources for 1987-88 will be allocated.

WALES

New Hospital, Cardiff

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes the building of the new hospital in Cardiff will commence; when it is scheduled to finish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The planning of services in Cardiff, including new hospitals, is a matter for South Glamorgan health authority, which has commissioned a strategic review of services and needs.

Cardiff, South (Redevelopment)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the redevelopment of Cardiff, South; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have now received the results of further studies into the feasibility of building a barrage across the Cardiff harbour mouth and of the investment potential in the south Cardiff area, along with a study into conservation issues. These are being considered very carefully and I shall make known my decision very soon.

Nuclear-free Zone (South Glamorgan)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how much has been spent by South Glamorgan county council in connection with its nuclear free zone on (a) literature, (b) postage, (c) administration, (d) advertising and (e) shelters.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: None. This is a matter for South Glamorgan county council.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of (a) males unemployed, (b) females unemployed and (c) total unemployed in Wales, have been unemployed for a year or more; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The proportions of males, females and persons in Wales unemployed for over 52 weeks are given in the following table:

Unemployed over 52 weeks as a per cent. of all unemployed

Date (October each year)	Males	Females	Persons
1979	31·9	16·9	26·2
1980	22·2	14·2	19·6
1981	32·7	21·9	29·4
1982[1]	41·2	27·0	36·9
1982[1]	39·9	23·1	35·4
1983[2]	43·0	27·4	38·4
1984	44·7	29·8	40·3
1985	47·0	31·3	42·4
1986[3]	46·6	31·4	42·0

[1] In October 1982 the unemployment system changed from registered unemployed to unemployed claimants; both figures are given for comparison purposes.
[2] Figures from 1983 are affected by the provisions of the budget of that year, which meant that certain men aged 60 and over are no longer required to claim.
[3] In March 1986 the count date was delayed by two weeks to reduce double counting.

Wages

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many of the (a) males employed in Wales, (b) females employed in Wales and the (c) total in employment in Wales are earning £115 per week or less;

(2) what proportion of (a) the male work force in Wales, (b) the female work force in Wales and (c) the total work force in Wales are earning £115 per week or less.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information available closest to that requested is as follows:

Distribution of gross weekly earnings of full-time employees on adult rates:

	Wales[1] April 1985 Percentage with weekly earnings less than
	£110 per cent.	£120 per cent.
Full-time males on adult rates	14·4	20·3
Full-time females on adult rates	49·9	60·8
Full-time employees on adult rates	25·4	32·9

[1] Full-time employees on adult rates, whose pay for the survey pay period was not affected by absence.
Source: "New Earnings Survey", table 114, Part E 1985

The available information is based on a simple survey which provides estimates of the proportions of employees in employment in certain earnings bands without providing a detailed head count.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how the net provisions for the total Welsh housing programme in 1987-88 compares with the expected outturn in 1986-87; and if he will show the difference in (a) real terms and (b) cash terms.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much of the additional expenditure on housing in 1987-88 has been allocated to Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the answer I gave yesterday in reply to questions asked by the hon. Members for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) and Meirionydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas), at columns 300-1.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many local authority dwellings have been demolished in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: 370 local authority dwellings have been demolished since January 1984. Similar information was not collected prior to this date.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total local authority housing stock in Wales sold since 1979, listing how many in each of the following categories there were (a) houses, (b) bungalows, (c) maisonettes and (d) flats.

Mr. Mark Robinson: 50,275 local authority dwellings were sold in Wales between January 1979 and September 1986. Statistics are not collected on bungalows and maisonettes, but since April 1980 data on houses and flats have been collected separately. Between April 1980 and September 1986, 47,827 houses and 673 flats were sold.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many cervical cancer deaths have occurred in each Welsh health authority for each year from 1979 to 1985, inclusive.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the following table:

Death caused by malignant neoplasm of cervix uteri (ICD 180)

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Motorway Fatalities

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many deaths have occurred on motorways in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Between January 1980 and December 1985, 39 fatalities occurred on, or at junctions with, motorways in Wales. Provisional figures for the seven months of 1986 show a further four fatalities.

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh bathing beaches currently fail to comply with European Economic Community cleanliness standards; and how many of these are officially classified as large bathing beaches.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Directive 76/160/EEC concerns the quality of bathing water and I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government on 18 December 1985, at columns 223-28. The results of the survey will be published.

House Prices

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average house price in each Welsh county.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The average house price for all properties in Wales during 1985 was £25,315. Information is not available for individual Welsh counties.

O-level Passes

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of Welsh schoolchildren have achieved at least five O-level passes in each year from 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in the precise form requested is not available. However, figures from the school leavers survey, given in the following table, show the percentage of all school leavers in Wales who achieved five or more higher grade O-level or CSE qualifications.

Year of leaving school	Percentage of all school leavers with 5 or more higher grade 'O' level or CSE qualifications

Urban Regeneration

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been received in Wales for urban regeneration grants; and how many are expected to be approved in the current financial year.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Part III of the Housing and Planning Act 1986 which will be the authority for the payment of urban regneration grant is not expected to be in operation until the new year. In these circumstances, we do not aniticipate approving any urban regeneration grant projects in the current financial year.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales which health authorities in Wales currently provide in-patient beds for registered drug addicts;

(2) how many in-patient beds are available in Wales for registered drug addicts.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Beds are not provided for registered drug addicts. Where in-patient treatment of drug misusers is required this is provided within the overall mental illness complement. There is a specialist unit for the treatment of drug and alcohol misuse at Whitchurch hospital, Cardiff, with a total bed complement of 21.

AIDS

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh people have been diagnosed as suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In Wales nine people have been reported as having acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and seven have subsequently died.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

13. Mr. Patchett asked the Paymaster General what is the average weekly wage payable under the community programme.

Mr. Lee: Community programme participants are paid wages which reflect the local rate for the job. Managing agents and sponsors of projects are reimbursed for wage costs up to a maximum average of £67 per participant per week. This was raised from £63 on 1 April 1986 and is kept under review.

62. Mr. Eastham asked the Paymaster General what proportion of people leaving the community programme obtain a permanent job.

Mr. Lee: The results of the latest survey of former community programme participants show that 54 per cent. of those responding had had at least one job within 10 months of leaving the community programme. About 30 per cent. of respondents obtained a job or training immediately on leaving.

Greater Manchester

14. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General what factors have determined the rise in unemployment in Greater Manchester since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The principal reason for the rise in unemployment in Greater Manchester has been the decline in labour intensive, traditional industries. Lack of competitiveness due to overmanning and high labour costs contributed to this loss of jobs. Unemployment also reflects an increase in the number of people seeking work.

Local Enterprise Agencies

15. Mr. Bellingham asked the Paymaster General how many local enterprise agencies have so far been set up; and how many jobs he estimates they have helped create.

Mr. Trippier: There are currently 352 local enterprise agencies throughout the United Kingdom of which 278 are approved under the terms of the Finance Act 1982 which allows business sector sponsors tax relief on their contributions to such bodies.

As regards new job creation, survey information collected on behalf of Business in the Community earlier this year indicated that the 90 agencies replying to a question on this had helped create nearly 19,000 new jobs. The survey was a follow up to one completed last year and was funded by my Department.

Training

16. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Paymaster General what proposals he has for significantly increasing the quantity of training for managers, for high technology needs and for technicians.

Mr. Trippier: The Government believe that training is primarily the responsibility of industry itself: but we are helping industry through a wide range of schemes to develop and improve the managerial and technical skills of its workforce. We have supported two major studies on the future of management education. We have doubled provision under the training for enterprise programme for training the managers of small businesses. Through the Open Tech programme we have developed over 20,000 hours of learning material for managers and technicians. We are also helping with the initial supply of technically trained young people through the YTS, and in higher education through the engineering and technology programme.

29. Mr. Sumberg asked the Paymaster General whether he will make a statement on the present method of funding industrial training.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's policies on the funding of training are set out in the White Paper "Training for Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135) and "Working Together—Education and Training" (Cmnd. 9823). The primary responsibility for assessing industry's skill needs and ensuring they are met lies with employers, both individually, and collectively through industry training organisations.

The Government make a major contribution particularly in arranging training for young people under the YTS, and in selective support designed to assist and encourage employers to identify and meet their training needs. The Government have also accepted the plan of work for a major study by the Manpower Services Commission of the funding of vocational education and training, including industrial training.

36. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about training for the unemployed.

Mr. Trippier: This year we plan to help some 190,000 unemployed people through our adult training programmes.

Trade Union Practices

17. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Paymaster General if he has received representations about the operation of recent employment legislation in respect of trade union practices.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. I welcome such representations. In dealing with them I am able to provide information and advice on the current legislation and remedies available against unlawful practices. They also help me to judge how the law is working in practice, and how it might need to be developed in the future.

Bradford

18. Mr. Madden asked the Paymaster General how many people are unemployed in Bradford.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the Bradford local authority area was 29,748.

Restart Scheme

19. Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about the restart scheme.

21. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the progress of the restart scheme.

45. Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about the progress of the restart scheme for the long-term jobless.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friends to my reply to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) earlier today.

27. Mr. Lilley asked the Paymaster General what is the number of those invited to attend the restart scheme in the St. Albans and Harpenden area who have subsequently signed off the unemployment register.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of those invited to a restart interview up to 9 October who subsequently ceased to claim benefit as unemployed in the St. Albans, Harpenden and Borehamwood area, is 159. People cease to claim unemployment benefits for a variety of reasons and it is not possible to say how many of these took up, for example, employment, self-employment or training.

52. Mr. Strang asked the Paymaster General how many people have been interviewed for the restart scheme; and what is his estimate of the number likely to be interviewed by 31 December.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: By 9 October 1986, 366,451 people had been interviewed as part of restart. It is likely that by 31 December the total will have risen to about 650,000.

63. Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General what has been the reduction in the numbers of those claiming benefit arising from the restart programme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is impossible to estimate what proportion of those long term unemployed people who have ceased to claim benefit in recent months have done so because of the restart programme.

66. Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General how many people have been interviewed under the restart programme; and how many have obtained permanent jobs as a result.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: By 9 October 1986, 366,451 people had been interviewed. We do not know how many have obtained permanent jobs as a result. Some have been placed as a direct result of their restart interview, but many others have found jobs after taking up one or other of the opportunities offered at the restart interview such as jobclubs or training courses.

40. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the number of people who have secured employment as a result of the restart scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no means of knowing. Some people have been placed in jobs as a direct result of their restart interview, but many others have found jobs after taking up one or other of the opportunities offered at the restart interview such as jobclubs or training courses.

41. Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General how many people have had benefit suspended for failure to attend restart interviews; how many of these have appealed; and how many have had benefit restarted as a result of appeal.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not available in the precise form asked for, but as at 9 October 1986 the number of people who had benefit disallowed by independent adjudication officers as a result of failure to attend a restart interview was 3,873.

Records for the number of appeals to a social security appeal tribunal are not available.

42. Mr. Silvester asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the success rate of the restart programme in the North-West.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). By 9 October 74,134 people in the north-west region had been interviewed under the restart programme.

72. Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General how many unemployed people in Coventry will be interviewed under the restart programme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Figures are not available for Coventry. However in Coventry and Warwickshire as a whole we estimate that between 20,000 and 25,000 long term unemployed people will have been interviewed by the end of March.

Fast Service Restaurant Industry

20. Mr. Marland asked the Paymaster General what estimate he has of the number of jobs created by the fast service restaurant industry in the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Between June 1981 and June 1986 there was a net increase of 5,100 employees in employment in restaurants and other eating places. Figures are not separately available for fast service restaurants.

TVEI

22. Mr. Leigh asked the Paymaster General how many schools and colleges will be participating in the technical and vocational education initiative by the end of the year.

Mr. Trippier: About 650 schools and colleges are likely to be participating in the TVEI pilot projects by the end of 1986.

Jarrow

23. Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General what is the latest level of unemployment in the Jarrow constituency.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the Jarrow parliamentary constituency was 7,945.

Benefit

24. Mr. Hayward asked the Paymaster General what steps are being taken to ensure that only those who are entitled to unemployment benefit receive it.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement in the House on 28 October at columns 175 to 187. The changes that I announced will help us to identify those who are not genuinely seeking work. Those who are more properly entitled to alternative social security benefits, and those who can be helped in their efforts to re-enter employment. We have also increased the resources devoted to the investigation of benefit fraud during the last 12 months.

These measures are in addition to the normal day to day procedures applying in unemployment benefit offices.

School Leavers

25. Mr. Colvin asked the Paymaster General how many of the summer 1986 school leavers are registered as unemployed.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed school leavers under 18 years of age claiming benefit in the United Kingdom was 117,481. The statistics do not separately distinguish how many of these were summer 1986 school leavers.

Special Employment Measures

26. Mr. Allen Mckay asked the Paymaster General how many people are currently covered by special employment measures.

Mr. Lee: At the end of September there were 369,250 people assisted by our employment measures and by 9 October, the latest date for which figures are available, 366,451 people had been interviewed under the restart programme.

Jobstart Scheme

28. Mr. Sackville asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the progress of the jobstart scheme.

Mr. Lee: The jobstart scheme, which was introduced with the restart programme, began on 1 July 1986. By 13 November 2,015 applications had been accepted.

Inner City Areas

30. Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to generate employment in inner city areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's policy of defeating inflation and establishing an enterprising national economy will generate sustained growth and increased employment in our inner cities as elsewhere. The inner city task forces and city action teams are active in promoting enterprise in their areas. They also aim to secure the maximum impact on the inner city of existing Government programmes, and particularly the employment and training programmes operated by the Manpower Services Commission and the Department of the Environment's urban and derelict land programmes.

The success of the task forces and city action teams will depend on the support and co-operation of the local community, including business, voluntary bodies and the local authority. I am glad to say that generally they are getting this support and co-operation.

Enterprise Agencies

31. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Paymaster General how many enterprise agencies are currently in operation; and if he will estimate the number of jobs created by these agencies.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham).

65. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on progress being made by enterprise agencies in the west midlands.

Mr. Trippier: My Department's west midlands regional enterprise unit is currently working closely with the fourteen local enterprise agencies within the region. These agencies, together with a further four that are in the process of formation, will provide coverage for all parts of the region.

All the established local enterprise agencies have developed business plans which are an essential feature for the proper development of agencies. These agencies, like most others, have financial worries, but the last year has seen a significant increase in the amount of private sector funds donated to them. And I am sure that this trend will continue, spurred on as it will be by the Government's local enterprise agency grant scheme.

With the greater certainty that stems from a more secure financial base the west midlands enterprise agencies are increasingly seeking ways in which they can expand and improve the quality of their services. Through this development of their activities the agencies are enhancing the already valuable role that they are playing in the creation of jobs and small firms growth in the west midlands.

67. Mr. Greenway asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the role of enterprise agencies in creating jobs.

Mr. Trippier: It is viable and profitable businesses that create jobs. Local enterprise agencies can help the formation and growth of such businesses by advice and counselling and the provision of other services such as managed workshops, help in finding finance and so on.

Jobclubs

32. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Paymaster General how many jobclubs are now in operation.

68. Mr. Hirst asked the Paymaster General how many jobclubs have so far been established; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: On 13 November 1986, 276 jobclubs were in operation. Jobclubs have proved to be an extremely effective means of helping people who have been out of work for six months or more. Over 60 per cent. of people currently leaving jobclubs are going into jobs. A further 13 per cent. either find temporary work on the community programme or go on to training courses.

My right hon. and noble Friend has asked the Manpower Services Commission to expand the jobclub network to 1,000 by April 1987 and, if the need continues, to 2,000 by September 1987.

Labour Statistics

33. Mr. Skinner asked the Paymaster General how many times the method of compiling the unemployment figures has been changed by his Department since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There have been two changes to the method of compiling the unemployment figures and a further minor statistical change to reduce over-recording in Northern Ireland.

34. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Paymaster General what was the most recent percentage level of unemployment in the United Kingdom; and what were the comparable average percentages for the rest of the European Economic Community and for the EFTA nations, respectively, on the most recent date for which such comparative figures are available.

Mr. Lee: The latest available information is as follows:

United Kingdom	October	[1]11·5
Spain	June	21·0

[2] National Definitions (OECD Standardised rate not available).

44. Mr. Canavan asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of unemployed people in the United Kingdom.

86. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement of the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,237,154.

54. Mr. Loyden asked the Paymaster General if he will give the number of long-term unemployed in the Merseyside travel-to-work area.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of claimants in the Liverpool travel-to-work area who had been unemployed for over one year was 54,045.

71. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures in respect of people in work in the United Kingdom; and how they compare with the figures available for June 1983.

Mr. Lee: In June 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, the United Kingdom employed labour force was 24,595,000, seasonally adjusted: this compares with 23,603,000 in June 1983.

74. Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General what was the number of people unemployed in November 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Lee: The following table shows the estimated number of unemployed claimants excluding school leavers, adjusted for seasonality and discontinuity, for the United Kingdom for each of the years requested.

Year November	Total
1980	1,808,800
1981	2,462,500
1982	2,740,700
1983	2,904,600
1984	3,055,200
1985	3,113,800

75. Mr. Wallace: asked the Paymaster General what proportion of those leaving the unemployment register sign on again within three months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Based on a sample it would appear that about a quarter of the total number of claimants who ceased to be unemployed in Great Britain in 1985 returned to unemployment within three months of leaving the count.

79. Mr. Dubs asked the Paymaster General how many people are unemployed; and how many have been out of work for over 12 months.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,237,154. Of these 1,340,985 had been unemployed for over 12 months.

82. Mr. Yeo asked the Paymaster General how many people are employed in Britain at the latest available date.

Mr. Lee: In June 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, the employed labour force in Great Britain was 24,060,000. The figure has been adjusted for seasonal variations.

83. Mr. Amess asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of people registered as being unemployed in the constituency of Basildon for each of the last five years.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the Basildon parliamentary constituency in October of each year since 1983. The comparison is affected by the change in the timing of the compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

	Number
October 1983	6,372
October 1984	6,972
October 1985	6,492
October 1986	6,159

Youth Training Schemes

35. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Paymaster General how many young people are currently participating in the youth training schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: At 31 October, the latest date for which figures are available, 352,381 young people were in training on YTS in Great Britain. I am satisfied with the development of two-year YTS, and am confident that the YTS undertaking will be effectively met once again, as it has been in the previous three years.

49. Mr. Wigley asked the Paymaster General what proportion of young people who have been engaged on youth training schemes have subsequently found full-time employment in each of the years since the scheme's inception.

Mr. Trippier: Direct comparison between each of the three years of the operation of one year YTS is not appropriate. The results of the postal surveys conducted by the Manpower Services Commission are influenced by changes in the survey methodology. For example, an analysis of the relatively high proportion (6 per cent.) of 1985-86 leavers who said that they were "doing something else" has shown that the figures understate the true proportion of leavers in full-time work by about 2 per cent.

to 3 per cent. In addition the results for 1983-84 leavers cannot be treated as typical due to the very high incidence of early leavers. With these qualifications, the information requested is set out below:

	April 1983 and March 1984 (ad hoc surveys)	April 1984 and March 1985 (15 per cent. sample survey)	April 1985 and March 1986 (100 per cent. survey)
Percentage of leavers in full-time employment	49	55	53
Number of questionnaires issued	2,715	64,845	379,648
Usable response (percentage)	55	64	58
Percentage of respondents who were early leavers	90	55	48

59. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Paymaster General if he will give up to date figures for the proportion of YTS trainees who find a job in the United Kingdom and in the Norwich area.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts regular postal surveys of young people leaving YTS schemes. The latest surveys covering those who left YTS schemes between 1 April and 31 May 1986, show that in Great Britain 64 per cent. were in work some three months after leaving, and in the Norwich local authority district 75 per cent. were in work.

60. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Paymaster General what proportion of young people leaving YTS obtain jobs in the best and worst regions of the country.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts regular surveys of young people leaving YTS schemes. Results from these surveys (including data for regions) are placed in the Library of the House each month. I refer the hon. Member to these documents.

64. Mr. Hunter asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the working of the YTS in Hampshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I am satisfied with the development of the two year YTS in the area and the Manpower Services Commission is making moves to encourage more firms to recruit young people onto YTS with employee status. I am also confident that the YTS undertaking will be effectively met once again, as it has been in the previous three years.

70. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General how many people accepted on to YTS courses in 1985 or 1986 had five or more O-levels.

Mr. Trippier: Information is not available in the form requested. The Manpower Services Commission's regular surveys of YTS leavers show that, of those who left between April 1985 and March 1986, 14 per cent. had at least three GCE O-levels or equivalent when they joined the scheme.

85. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Paymaster General what percentage of YTS leavers in the Hertfordshire, West constituency obtained work, in the latest period available.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission's regular surveys of YTS leavers show that in Dacorum, the closest equivalent area to the Hertfordshire, West constituency for which figures are available, 72 per cent. of leavers between 1 April and 31 May 1986 were in work some three months later.

Leicester

37. Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General how many people in the city of Leicester are unemployed (i) according to present methods of calculation and (ii) according to the method of calculation that was in operation in 1979.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the City of Leicester was 19,566. It is not possible to give a reliable estimate of local unemployment on a 1979 basis, because the effect on the statistics of administrative changes in the payment of benefit cannot be accurately assessed.

Staffordshire, Moorlands

38. Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General how many people were out of work in the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency at the most recent count.

Mr. Lee: On 9 October 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency was 3,406.

"Competence and Competition"

39. Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made in increasing the level of resources devoted to training by British industry since the publication of "Competence and Competition".

Mr. Trippier: The successful introduction of two-year YTS demonstrates that industry's commitment to training is increasing. I was also encouraged by a recent survey of non-statutory training organisations which shows increasing activity in industry's training of adults. For their part, the Government have committed themselves to work with others to achieve radical modernisation of our vocational and education system, and our objectives are set out in the White Paper "Working Together — Education and Training" (Cmnd. 9823).

Skill Shortages

43. Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about skill shortages in British industry.

Mr. Trippier: There are indications that in parts of the country, some employers may not immediately be able to recruit experienced employees with certain specialised occupational skills. Such difficulties can affect employers' ability to increase output and productivity. Whilst it is primarily the responsibility of industry to identify and meet its own training needs, the Government recognise the problems faced particularly by small firms and where cross-sectoral skills are involved.

We are therefore providing direct help through a range of schemes run by the Manpower Services Commission to train employed and unemployed people in skills for which there is a known demand, and to help small firms, especially in retraining existing employees or training new recruits for hard-to-fill vacancies.

Action in the longer term to increase the supply of skills includes the two-year YTS, the non advanced further education initiative and other policies to provide and influence training, operated by the Manpower Services Commission.

Relocation (Grants)

46. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General how many people have been relocated with the aid of Government grants from areas of high unemployment to take up jobs in other parts of the United Kingdom in the past year; what has been the cost of these payments to the taxpayer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Several Government bodies provide assistance with relocation moves. We will gather the information and I shall write to the hon. Member.

Manufacturing Industry

47. Sir John Farr asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of jobs lost in manufacturing industry in the last available 12-month period.

Mr. Lee: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at different dates.

Between September 1985 and September 1986 there was a net decrease of 93,000 in the numbers of employees in employment and self-employed in manufacturing industries in Great Britain.

69. Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how many jobs have been lost in manufacturing since 1979 in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the rest of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Lee: The latest information (which is for 1984) shows that employment in manufacturing in the United Kingdom has fallen by 1,674,000 since 1979 compared with a fall of 2,254,000 for the rest of the European Economic Community — excluding Luxembourg and Greece for which there are no comparable figures. The United Kingdom still has a greater proportion of its employment in manufacturing than any other Community country apart from Germany.

Training Levy

48. Mr. Squire asked the Paymaster General if he has any proposals to introduce a training levy on British industry.

78. Mr. Cash asked the Paymaster General if he intends to make provision for a training levy on companies.

Mr. Trippier: No. Such a levy would cause serious harm to companies' competitiveness and reduce the overall quantity and quality of training. Our policy is to reduce the administrative burdens on industry, not to increase them.

Relocation (Financial Assistance)

50. Mr. Holt asked the Paymaster General how many people have been given financial assistance to relocate when obtaining employment in the south, south-east or East Anglia.

Mr. Lee: During the financial year ending 31 March 1986 the Manpower Services Commission's employment transfer scheme assisted 1,235 unemployed people to move to take up work in the south east region (which includes East Anglia) and 429 to move to London region. These figures do not include moves made by unemployed people within these two regions.

Training (Northern Region)

51. Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General how much is being spent on training in the northern region.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission (MSC) plans to spend £76·2 million on training in the northern region in the financial year 1986-87, £62·3 million on YTS and £13·9 million on its adult training programmes. The actual amount spent up to 31 October 1986 is £33·7 million on YTS and £5·9 million on its adult training programmes.

Adult Training

53. Mr. O'Brien asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to how current expenditures devoted to adult training compare with our major industrial competitors.

Mr. Trippier: International comparisons of adult training expenditures cannot be made with precision. However, it is clear that all our major industrial competitors put a major emphasis both on continuing and on initial training, and believe that their economic success would have been impossible without a strongly sustained vocational education and training effort.

61. Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss adult training.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. and noble Friend and I frequently meet the Chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss a wide range of issues, including adult training.

Tourism

55. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Paymaster General whether he has estimated the effect on the number of those employed in tourism of liberalisation of the licensing laws in England and Wales.

Mr. Trippier: No. However, last July the tourist boards issued a leaflet entitled "Time! Please" which said that the introduction of flexible hours could create up to 50,000 full and part-time jobs in public houses, hotels and restaurants.

57. Mr. Roger King asked the Paymaster General if he will outline the achievements of the Government since 1983 as regards increasing employment in the tourism industry.

87. Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General if he will outline what actions his Department has taken since June 1983 to date to encourage an increase in employment in the tourist industry.

Mr. Trippier: Following publication in July 1985 of the report "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs — The Business of Tourism" the Department of Trade and Industry's responsibilities for tourism policy in England and for Great Britain as a whole were transferred in September 1985 to the Department of Employment in recognition of tourism's important role in job creation. On 12 November 1985 my right hon. and noble Friend announced an increase of some 20 per cent. of £40 million in the funds available to the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board this year.

We published last July a report entitled "Action for Jobs in Tourism" reviewing the steps that we are taking to help strengthen tourism's contribution to employment, in particular describing progress on the action points in "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs" aimed at removing obstacles to the development of tourism.

Under Section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969, the English Tourist Board has, between 1983-84 and 1985-86, provided assistance totalling £34 million to over 1,500 tourism projects which directly created nearly 6,000 jobs. It is not possible to identify the number of jobs related to support which the Government give to the English Tourist Board and to the industry generally. However there is no doubt that tourism-related employment has risen in recent years. For example in the period between June 1983 and June 1986, 129,000 additional jobs were created in the main tourism-related industries.

Apprentices

56. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Paymaster General what information is available on the rates of pay for apprentices during their years of training and comparable full rates earned by a craftsman.

Mr. Lee: Information on minimum rates of pay for both adults and apprentices, as specified by major national agreements, is given in "Time Rates of Wages and Hours of Work" published by the Department of Employment. A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Channel Tunnel

58. Mr. Lester asked the Paymaster General whether his Department has estimated the likely effects of the building of the Channel tunnel on tourism in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government have no such estimates. However, the British Tourist Authority has established a Channel Tunnel National Tourism Committee to consider how best to ensure maximum benefit for the tourist industry.

Highfields Task Force

73. Mr. Spencer asked the Paymaster General if the Highfields task force is now receiving full co-operation in its work from the local authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I regret that the Highfields task force still does not have the full co-operation of either Leicester city council or Leicestershire county council. I hope that the city council will respond positively to recent proposals that it has received from the task force so that we can make better progress in Highfields. I would find it extraordinary if, for political reasons, either local authority persisted in seeking to frustrate Government efforts to improve the quality of life and job prospects of Highfields residents.

Long-term Unemployed Persons

76. Mr. Lambie asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about the training needs of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Trippier: Training to meet the needs of the long-term unemployed must aim to provide the skills relevant to finding employment in today's labour market. This includes training designed to increase confidence and motivation and to improve job finding skills, as well as training in occupational skills.

The Government have introduced a number of measures that provide specifically for the needs of the long-term unemployed, including the restart programme and most recently, the pilot job training scheme which is being tested as a means of providing work-related training and experience for those unemployed for over six months.

81. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the likely trend in the numbers of those on long-term unemployment.

Mr. Lee: The latest figures show that long-term unemployment has fallen. There was a fall of 7,000 in the number unemployed for more than a year between July and October, a period in which the total would normally rise because of seasonal influences.

Unemployment Benefit

77. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Paymaster General how many people have been refused unemployment benefit as a result of the new availability for work test.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested will not be available until statistics are collated following introduction of the revised procedures in unemployment benefit offices between October 1986 and January 1987.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

80. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Paymaster General how many people have so far benefited under the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Trippier: The enterprise allowance scheme has by the end of September 1986, enabled 177,685 previously unemployed people set up in self-employment. This figure includes 3,331 people who entered the pilot scheme between January 1982 and July 1983.

Debts (Late Payment)

84. Mr. Ottaway asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the Government's voluntary code on the late payment of debts.

Mr. Trippier: The practical guidance booklet "Payment on Time" received wide circulation in the business community and response to it has been good. The problems caused by delayed payment will not be solved overnight and I aim to continue encouraging a change of attitudes towards payment practice.

Hotel and Catering Industry

Mr. McCrindle asked the Paymaster General what discussions his Department has had with the Hotel and Catering Wages Council and employers regarding non-binding guidance on differential pay rates and the establishment of a single statutory rate of pay in the hotel and catering industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: No discussions have taken place with the Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant Wages Council on these subjects, but the issues have been considered with some employers and trade associations in recent months. I understand that the council has now decided to issue guidance with the notice of the new wages order. This goes beyond the role that I envisaged for wages councils. However, I appreciate the difficulties which faced the council in its first round of discussions under the new legislation and which caused this decision to be taken, and I welcome the way that the council has stressed the non-binding nature of its guidance.

Northampton Chamber of Commerce

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General if he will discuss with the Northampton chamber of commerce local difficulties in the recruitment of non-skilled staff.

Mr. Trippier: I have asked the jobcentre manager at Northampton to contact the local chamber of commerce to discuss its concerns and what we can do to tackle them.

THE ARTS

Arts Council

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts when he expects to announce the Government's allocation to the Arts Council of Great Britain for 1987-88.

Mr. Luce: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply of 17 November to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). The Arts Council's allocation will be £138·4 million.

Royal Opera House

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received concerning the financial position of the Royal Opera House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Theatre (Anniversary)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make additional funds available to the National Theatre to mark its 10th anniversary on the South Bank in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide the Treasury's estimate of average interest rates based on (i) the London clearing banks base rate and (ii) building societies mortgage rates for each quarter in the current financial year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The relevant average rates for the current financial year thus far are as follows:

1986 quarters	Average retail bank base rates	Average mortgage rate
Second quarter	10·4	11·7
Third quarter	10·0	11·0
Fourth quarter[1]	10·7	11·4

[1] to date

£1 Coins

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many £1 coins bearing the flax plant have been issued during this calendar year and any previous such years.

Mr. Lawson: So far this year 442,000 £1 coins bearing this design have been issued. No coins bearing this design were issued in any previous years.

EC Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to what amendments have been made by the European Assembly to the Council's draft EEC budget for 1587.

Mr. Brooke: The European Parliament completed its first reading of the 1987 Draft Budget on Thursday 13 November.

Provisional figures suggest that with regard to non-compulsory expenditure the Parliament has proposed increases of some 535 mecu (£336m)[1] in payments appropriations and some 1,075 mecu (£674m)[1] in commitment appropriations over the Council's Draft Budget for 1987.

Full details of all the amendments and draft modifications proposed by the Parliament will be deposited in the House in the usual way as soon as they are available.

[1] Converted at the 1987 budget rate of £1 = 1·5939 ecu.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what instructions have been issued to Government Departments about the use of outside public relations and advertising companies for publicity purposes.

Mr. Brooke: No new instructions have been issued. Public relations services for the Government are provided by the official information service. It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to contract public relations consultancies except occasionally for highly specialised purposes. Government advertising campaigns are contracted through the Central Office of Information to commercial advertising agencies which are selected to compete for Government business on the basis of advice from the independent Advisory Committee on Advertising.

Direct Trader Input, Dover

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cause of the delays to goods traffic at Dover in connection with the introduction by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise of the direct trader input system; what action has been taken to minimise such delays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to make any changes to the rules governing the valuation of North sea oil for petroleum revenue tax purposes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. The Government recognise that the operation of the current law on PRT valuation is uncertain in the sort of oil market that we have today; and that this uncertainty creates problems for the industry. Accordingly, we propose to bring forward legislation in the next Finance Bill to put the valuation of oil for PRT purposes on a more certain and appropriate basis. At the same time, we intend to introduce a related measure to determine what will be the basis of PRT liabilities in the case of oil sold at arm's length on the Brent market, where the number of deals done can result in the same cargo of oil being sold many times over.

Such a measure is necessary if PRT revenue in these circumstances is not to be eroded. We propose to consult the industry on the detail of these proposed changes, further details of which are set out in a press notice which the Inland Revenue is issuing today. The new legislation will apply from 1 January 1987.

Unpaid Tax (Interest)

Mr. Hayes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes any adjustment to the rates of interest on unpaid and overpaid inheritance tax, capital transfer tax and estate duty.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Capital transfer tax had separate rates of interest for transfers made in lifetime and on death. A single rate is proposed for inheritance tax: this will provide a worthwhile simplification for all concerned, but the special characteristics of these taxes make it appropriate to continue to have a slightly lower rate than for other taxes.

Orders have been laid today substituting a single rate of 8 per cent. interest for the former higher and lower rates of 11 per cent.—for lifetime—and 9 per cent.—for death transfers. This rate will be kept broadly in line with other interest rates, but will not necessarily change as often as the rate for other taxes.

The details are contained in an Inland Revenue press release issued tomorrow.

Tax Relief

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the estimated yearly tax relief payable on life assurance premiums and pension contributions in each financial year from 1979-80 to date.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986]: Latest estimates of the amount of relief given at source on life assurance premiums are as follows:

Life assurance premium relief at source

	£ million
1979-80	443
1980-81	546
1981-82	532
1982-83	586
1983-84	706
1984-85	733
1985-86	649
[1]1986-87	580

[1] Forecast.

Life assurance premium relief is available for premiums up to certain limits and any relief given at source in excess of these limits is reclaimed. It is estimated that the amount of relief to be reclaimed for 1986-87 is about £10 million.

Readily available estimates of the direct revenue costs of reliefs for pension contributions are available only for 1984-85 onwards and are as follows:

Direct revenue costs

	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 forecast £ million
Relief for:
Employees contributions to occupational pension schemes allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes	1,100	1,200	1,300
Employers contributions to occupational pension schemes allowed as a charge against profits for corporation tax purposes	[1]1,900	[1]1,900	[1]1,900
Retirement annuity premiums	320	330	350

[1] These estimates are particularly tentative.

EEC Payment

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, why the provision for net payments to the European Economic Community in the current financial year has been increased by £440,000,000 in the revised public expenditure plans, if he will publish a table showing the net contributions in each of the previous seven years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986]: The provision for net payments to European Community institutions in the current financial year has been increased by £440 million in the revised public expenditure plans because it reflects:

a lower estimate of the UK's share of receipts from the budget;
a larger VAT adjustment in August than previously expected;
an assumed advance of £130 million of traditional own resources from April 1987 to March 1987 (and thus from 1987-8 to 1986-7) because of the Community's expected shortage of funds; larger than expected contributions to the EIB.

The figures requested for the previous seven years are:

	£ million cash
1979-80	841
1980-81	168
1981-82	103
1982-83	576
1983-84	853
1984-85	936
1985-86	800

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Research Assistants

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Lord Privy Seal how many research assistants are employed by Members of the House of Commons; and what is the number and percentage from (a) the United Kingdom, (b) United States of America and (c) any other country.

Mr. Biffen: A total of 523 Research Assistants currently hold either temporary or full Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes. Of these:

(a) 431 (82 per cent.), are British nationals.
(b) 71 (14 per cent.), are from America.
(c) 21 (4 per cent.), are from other countries.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Lord Privy Seal what will be the total spending of the Privy Council Office on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Biffen: I shall answer on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office: None since August 1981. Expenditure in earlier years was:

1979-80	19,600
1980-81	25,600
1981-82	10,500

Mr. Dobson asked the Lord Privy Seal what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio, newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Biffen: I take it the question refers to expenditure by the Privy Council Office and shall answer on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office.

No expenditure since 1979-80 and none is planned for the current year.

Mr. Dobson asked the Lord Privy Seal how many press and public relations staff are employed in the Privy Council Office; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Biffen: I shall answer on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office: none since August 1981. For 1979-80, 1980-81 and up until August 1981 three press and public relations staff were employed.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Lord Privy Seal what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Biffen: I take it the question refers to expenditure by the Privy Council Office and have interpreted 'outside consultants' as management and computer consultants. I shall answer on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office.

None since 1984-85; figures for earlier years can be produced only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what month he next intends to pay an official visit to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has accepted Mr. Shevardnadze's invitation to visit the Soviet Union next year. Precise dates have not yet been discussed.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has as President of the European Council to raise the question of human rights and the Helsinki agreement with the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend expressed very clearly the concern of the Twelve at human rights abuses in the Soviet Union in the speech which he made on 4 November to the Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting on behalf of the Twelve. A copy has been deposited in the Library.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards human rights in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 18 November, at column 143.

Afghanistan

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to take any initiative as President of the European Council, regarding the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: On behalf of the European Community my right hon. and learned Friend made it clear to the United Nations General Assembly on 23 September that the Soviet Union should implement the principles that must underly a solution in Afghanistan — principles which were again massively endorsed by international community on 5 November—and withdraw all its troops from Afghanistan without delay.

Systime plc

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions reported to or by the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington when United States Embassy staff made official communications with Systime plc in relation to the United States fine on that company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We were first made aware of discussions between Systime and the US Department of Commerce by the company in April 1983. We are not aware that US embassy staff played any part in those discussions.

Arms Control

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the proposal that the MBFR talks be shelved and conventional force reduction talks transferred to a new Europe-wide forum as part of the CSCE process.

Mr. Renton: The question of our future approach to the mutual balanced force reduction talks in Vienna, and indeed to the whole question of the conventional arms control in Europe, is still under discussion within the NATO high level task force on conventional arms control in Europe. In the meantime, we should welcome a proper response from the Warsaw Pact to our proposals of December 1985, in which we made a constructive attempt to break the long-standing deadlock in the talks.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what progress is being made by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation high level task force on conventional arms control; and whether he expects it to be able to recommend a future course for conventional force reduction talks when it reports to North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Ministers in December.

Mr. Renton: On 29 October the high level task force produced its interim report, which contained analysis of the negotiating histories of both MBFR and CDE, which assessed the recent Eastern proposals on conventional arms control, and which provided basic guidance for Western ministerial interventions at the opening of the Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting. The task force is now working on its report to the North Atlantic Council ministerial meeting in December. Its recommendations will form the basis for discussions between Allied Ministers and for the evolution of Alliance policy thereafter. We are participating fully and constructively in the discussions of the task force.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of a linkage with strategic and theatre nuclear force reductions on the future progress of talks on reductions in conventional forces.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. friend the Prime Minister and President Reagan agreed at Camp David on 15 November that reductions in nuclear weapons would increase the importance of eliminating conventional disparities. Nuclear weapons cannot be dealt with in isolations, given the need for overall balance at all times.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Eggar: This information is available only for managerial and computer consultants from the year 1984-85. Foreign and Commonwealth expenditure is:

	1984-85 £	1985-86 £	[1]1986-87 £
FCO Diplomatic Wing	113,580	257,620	399,250
FCO ODA Wing	28,164	144,598	80,000

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the total spending of his Department on Press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is as follows:

Total expenditure on press and public relations was as follows (£ million)

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Payments to Central Office of Information for overseas information material and related activies	9·3	11·2	12·6	14·7	17·4	18·8	18·3	19·1
Other Information Services	0·4	0·3	0·6	0·7	0·9	0·8	0·9	0·7
Running cost of Diplomatic Wing Information News Departments	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	1·8	1·4	1·9	n/a
Running cost of ODA Wing Information Department	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	0·3	0·3	0·3	n/a
Cost of Information Staff at Overseas Posts	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	12·4	12·8	13·6	n/a
Total	9·7	11·5	13·2	15·4	32·8	34·1	35·0	19·8

Most of this expenditure is incurred in carrying out the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's responsibilities for the projection of Britain's image and Her Majesty's Government's policies in overseas countries.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Eggar: FCO expenditure on advertising and other promotional literature in past financial years was as follows:

	FCO (Diplomatic Wing) £	FCO (ODA Wing) £
1979-80	100,226	214,739
1980-81	116,532	145,697
1981-82	162,988	207,964
1982-83	229,711	135,506

	FCO (Diplomatic Wing)	FCO (ODA Wing)
1983-84	205,247	252,691
1984-85	149,932	234,050
1985-86	160,535	271,084
[1]1986-87	222,000	290,000

[1] Estimated.

This expenditure relates mainly to advertising for recruitment and promotional literature in the United Kingdom. A disaggregation of these totals is not available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Eggar: The numbers of staff employed in the Foreign and Commonwealth Department news department and Overseas Development Administration press office in each year since 1979-80 have been:

Year	Staff
1979-80	21·5
1980-81	21·5
1981-82	26·0
1982-83	27·0
1983-84	26·0
1984-85	26·0
1985-86	26·5
1986-87	25·5

INF (Talks)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the prospects for inclusion in INF talks of (a) theatre-assigned submarine-launched ballistic missiles and (b) dual-capable aircraft.

Mr. Renton: The INF negotiations at the Geneva nuclear and space talks, to which the United Kingdom is not a party, currently deal only with land-based cruise and ballistic missiles.

NATO Alliance policy since 1979 has been that INF arms control should be a step-by-step process. The immediate priority is for an agreement on a global basis as discussed at Reykjavik: a zero-zero solution on land-based cruise and ballistic missiles in Europe, with tight limits on SS20s in Soviet Asia and on Soviet shorter range INF. Discussion of submarine-launched ballistic missiles and dual capable aircraft could be for consideration once the initial agreement on land-based missiles was achieved.

Lesotho (Kidnapping)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Government of Lesotho in regard to the reported kidnapping and murdering of Mr. Desmond Sixishe and Mr. Vincent Makhele, Cabinet Ministers of the former Lesotho Government.

Mrs. Chalker: This incident is an internal matter, for investigation by the Lesotho authorities. The Government of Lesotho have announced that they are conducting an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the abductions. We await the result of this investigation.

WALES

Renal Dialysis

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest available figures for the cost per patient of each renal dialysis treatment carried out (a) in National Health Service hospitals and (b) in private units within National Health Service hospitals; and how many patients are treated under arrangements (a) and (b), respectively.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are 71 patients currently receiving renal dialysis treatment for end stage renal failure in National Health Service hospitals in Wales. The cost per patient treatment is not held centrally. There are 22 patients currently receiving this treatment in private units within National Health Service hospitals in Wales. The average cost per patient treatment is presently £80·23.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Figures for total expenditure on press and public relations that can be readily identified are as follows:

1979-80	451,355
1980-81	511,656
1981-82	519,000
1982-83	575,090
1983-84	637,636
1984-85	692,854
1985-86	834,556
1986-87	[1]518,350

[1]Budgeted expenditure only.

These figures include expenditure on information and publicity material, and salaries and accommodation for all information grades and support staff based on ready reckoner figures for the years 1979-80 to 1985-86. The figure for 1986-87 gives expenditure only as ready reckoner figures are not yet available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman for figures for expenditure on newspaper and television advertising to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 8 May 1984, at column 287, for the years 1979-80 to 1983-84, and on 6 December 1985, at column 353, for the financial year 1984-85.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information relating to the appointment by my Department of outside consultants prior to the financial year 1984-85 is not readily available and to provide it would involve disproportionate costs.

The spending of fees for outside consultants in respect of centrally managed tasks in the financial year 1984-85 and subsequent years is as follows:

Financial Year	£
1984-85	93,654
1985-86	55,688
[1]1986-87	32,000

[1] estimated.

It is not possible to identify without disproportionate costs fees paid to outside consultants in respect of projects not centrally managed.

Mr. Pattie: I refer to the answer which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 27 January, at column 385, which covered the years 1981 to 1985. Figures are not readily available for 1979-80. The equivalent staff number for 1 April 1986 is 120 and the combined running cost budgets of information division and BOTB's publicity unit for 1986-87 are around £1·8 million.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General what will be the total spending of the Lord Chancellor's Department and his Department, respectively, on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

The Attorney-General: The estimated spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on press and public relations in 1986-87 is £26,100.

For the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 the expenditure was £5,180 and £13,253 respectively.

The amounts spent for the previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

My Department incurred no expenditure on press and public relations in the years to which the question relates and the estimate spending for the current year is nil.

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General how many press and public relations staff are employed in the Lord Chancellor's Department and his Department, respectively, and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

The Attorney-General: The number of press and public relations staff employed in the Lord Chancellor's department is as follows:

1984-85	1985-86	1986-87

There were no such staff employed in the period up to 1983-84.

My Department employed no press or public relations staff in the period covered by the question and there are no plans to do so.

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General what will be the estimated spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department and his Department, respectively, on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

The Attorney-General: The estimated spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on promotional literature, and so on, for 1986-87, including staff costs, is £149,432.

My Department incurred no expenditure on consultants in the years to which the question relates, and the estimated spending for the current year is nil.

Fraud (Prosecutions)

Mr. Bright asked the Attorney-General what are his latest figures for fraud prosecution under fraud investigation group procedures; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The latest information from the Crown Prosecution Service relates to the first nine months of 1986. During that period 66 trials on indictment (involving 149 defendants) handled by the fraud divisions at Crown Prosecution Service headquarters have been completed. Pleas of guilty or convictions were obtained in 58 cases. The outcome of those cases when analysed in terms of defendants was as follows:

	Number
Pleaded Guilty:	88
Convicted:	45
Acquitted:	16

Of the 66 cases, 16 were formally designated as FIG cases. In 15 of these cases convictions were secured. In most cases handled by the fraud divisions FIG methods are used even where a case is not formally so designated.

The total sum at risk in the cases dealt with this year to the 30 September was £147 million. The average length of trial in contested cases was 13 days, and the average time from first reference to the fraud divisions to plea or verdict was less than 16 months.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 17 November, at columns 49-50.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister what will be the spending of her office on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Housing Policy

Mr. Pavitt asked the Prime Minister if she will arrange a transfer of resources for those with special housing needs from the Department of Health and Social Security to the Department of the Environment housing budget in order that responsibility for a comprehensive housing policy could be within a single Department.

The Prime Minister: The Secretary of State for the Environment already has a comprehensive responsibility for housing policy. There is full co-ordination of policies with the Department of Health and Social Security and other interested Departments. Transfers of resources between the two Departments are made as and when the need arises.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the number of classics graduates in each year in total from (a) Scottish universities and (b) universities in Britain since 1980; and if he will express these figures as a percentage of the total number of graduates in each case.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

Mrs. Rumbold: Some 100 letters about religious assemblies were received during the past year, of which three were complaints that the statutory requirements were not being met in particular schools. My right hon. Friend undertakes a full and careful investigation of all such complaints.

Mr. C. A. McLean

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green may expect a reply to the letter he wrote to the Minister of State, Department of Education and Science on 20 March on behalf of his constituent Mr. C. A. McLean, to which no acknowledgement has been received despite reminders sent on 29 April, 6 June, 24 July and 25 September.

Mrs. Rumbold: I regret that my hon. Friend's letter of 20 March was mislaid within the Department. I have replied today to the copy which he enclosed with his letter of 25 September, and I apologise unreservedly for the delay.

Mature Students

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what difference in the level of expenditure his Department expect from the recent changes made to the assessment of mature student grants.

Mr. Walden: Increased rates of allowances for older students are expected to result in additional expenditure of about £500,000 per annum.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans his Department has to encourage mature students over the age of 26 years to enrol on education courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The number of home students entering full-time higher education in Great Britain at the age of 25 or over has increased by 20 per cent. since 1979. Under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations, students over the age of 25 are treated as independent and their grant is not subject to a parental contribution. Students aged 26 and over who satisfy certain conditions relating to previous earnings are eligible for additional age-related allowances, and these allowances were increased in 1986-87 by an average of 10 per cent. There are other supplementary allowances for students with dependants.

In addition, the Department's PICKUP and Replan programmes are helping to increase the education and training opportunities available for employees and unemployed adults respectively.

British Geological Survey

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he requests the Natural Environment Research Council to publish a separate report for the year 1986 by the British Geological Survey; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: I understand that a report for the British Geological Survey for 1985-86 is in preparation and that this will be published in the near future. It is planned to publish a similar report for 1986-87 in about a year's time.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will advise the Natural Environment Research Council to defer any public advertisement for a new director of the British Geological Survey until after the receipt of the Butler report; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: Decisions about the appointments of senior staff of the Natural Environment Research Council, including that of the director of the British Geological Survey, are matters for the council.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when a Minister in his Department next expects to visit the British Geological Survey; and when the last such visit took place.

Mr. Walden: There are no plans for such a visit. The last visit to the British Geological Survey by a Minister from this Department was by my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, on 8 October 1985, on the occasion of the official opening of the new British Geological Survey headquarters at Keyworth, Nottingham.

Geological Surveying (Report)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive a report from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils regarding Sir Clifford Butler's study group on geological surveying; and whether the report will be laid before the House.

Mr. Walden: I understand that Sir Clifford Butler is expected to submit the report of his study group to the chairman of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council, who jointly commissioned the study, by the end of the year. It will be for the two chairmen to decide if they wish subsequently to submit the report, with their comments, to my right hon. Friend.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish, or place in the Library, the text of the advice he received from non-Government sources concerning the degree of differential incorporated in his offer of October to the Burnham committee.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend indicated in his statement to the House on 30 October that his proposals were based on the report of the Main committee, which was presented to Parliament as Cmnd. 9893 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on 2 October.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Polling Booths

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amounts were spent on the storage, handling, distribution, repair and replacement of polling booths at the last round of local government elections throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hogg: This information is not collected by central Government.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement outlining the guidelines regarding the design or construction of polling booths and their distribution.

Mr. Hogg: The distribution of polling booths at parliamentary, European Parliament and local government elections in the United Kingdom is a matter for the returning officer, who is required to provide each polling station with sufficient compartments to enable the electorate to cast their votes in secret. The official guidelines on the design and construction of such compartments are contained in Home Office circulars RPA 214, 219 and 269, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Cardiff

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to visit Cardiff in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I hope to make a visit to south Wales in January 1987. The programme for the visit has not yet been decided.

Wormwood Scrubs

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Wormwood Scrubs prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; how many classes took place and for how many hours; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during that week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the workshops were open for an average of 18 hours; an average of 470 prisoners were employed each working day in the workshops and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 87 education classes (52 day-time, 35 evening) took place for a total of 209 hours; there were an average of eight prisoners in each class. It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, associatiion, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out of cell activities.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Wormwood Scrubs prison in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally once a week. On 14 November 1986 HM prison Wormwood Scrubs held 1,405 prisoners.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Wormwood Scrubs on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: The number is 701.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Wormwood Scrubs prison; how many baths or showers each prisoner is allowed per week; and how many changes of clothes each prisoner is allowed per week.

Mr. Mellor: The number of baths, showers and toilets available are as follows:

	Number
Baths	4
Showers	128
WCs	96
Urinals	93

Each prisoner is normally allowed one shower per week and an additional shower when he makes use of the gymnasium. Additional showers are available for prisoners employed on jobs of a physically dirty nature or on return from court appearances. When appropriate for medical reasons a bath is available instead of a shower. Prisoners at Wormwood Scrubs have one change of clothes per week consisting of one shirt, one T-shirt, two pairs of socks, two pairs of underpants and two vests. Overclothing is changed as necessary, but on return from court prisoners receive a full kit of clean clothes.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many square feet of exercise space is available to prisoners in Wormwood Scrubs prison.

Mr. Mellor: The amount is 48,870 sq ft in exercise yards and 6,780 sq ft in the sports hall.

Brixton Prison

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Brixton prison in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally once a week. On 14 November 1986, Her Majesty's prison Brixton held 1,086 prisoners.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Brixton prison on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: The number is 113.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Brixton prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; how many classes took place and for how many hours; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during that week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the one workshop at Brixton was open for 20 hours; an average of 106 prisoners were employed in the workshop and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 30 evening education classes took place for a total of 73 hours; there were an average of four prisoners in each class. It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, association, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out of cell activities.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Brixton prison; how many baths or showers each prisoner is allowed per week; and how many changes of clothes each prisoner is allowed per week.

Mr. Mellor: Nineteen baths, 80 showers, 95 WCs and 68 urinals are available in Brixton prison. In general all prisoners have access to a bath or shower daily. This routine may be varied for medical cases or for prisoners appearing at court. Prison clothing is exchanged at least once a week but more frequently if considered necessary —for example for prisoners on kitchen parties and some other work parties. Unconvicted prisoners may wear private clothing and this may be exchanged on visits.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many square feet of exercise space are available to prisoners in Brixton prison.

Mr. Mellor: Thirty-nine thousand four hundred and sixty one square feet.

Pentonville Prison

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Pentonville prison in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally once a week. On 14 November 1986 Her Majesty's prison Pentonville held 1,049 prisoners.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Pentonville prison; how many baths or showers each prisoner is allowed per week; and how many changes of clothes each prisoner is allowed per week.

Mr. Mellor: The number of baths, showers and toilets available are as follows:

	Total
Baths	39
Showers	22
WCs	115
Urinals	78

Each prisoner is normally allowed one bath per week and a shower when he makes use of the gymnasium. Additional showers are available for prisoners employed on jobs of a physically dirty nature or on return from court appearances.

Prisoners at Pentonville have one change of clothes per week consisting of two shirts, two pairs of socks, two pairs of underpants and two vests. Overclothing is changed as necessary, but on return from court prisoners receive a full kit of clean clothes.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many square feet of exercise space is available to prisoners in Pentonville prison.

Mr. Mellor: Approximately 30,000 sq ft in exercise yards and 3,260 sq ft in the gymnasium.

Greiss Test

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will summarise the findings of the research commissioned by his Department upon the Greiss test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. This work was undertaken as a part of my right hon. Friend's review of the Birmingham pub bombings case. It would not be proper to say anything about the findings before we have reached a conclusion on what action, if any, we should take with regard to the convictions.

Metropolitan Police (Miners' Strike)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the amounts recovered by the Metropolitan Police from other forces for costs incurred during the miners' strike; and what amounts are still outstanding.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the amounts paid to the Metropolitan police by other police forces in respect of mutual aid supplied during the miners' dispute and the outstanding claims are as follows:

	Recovered £	Outstanding claims £
Derbyshire	5,376,000	—
Durham	59,000	—
Essex	6,000	—
Humberside	1,928,000	—
Kent	105,000	—
Leicestershire	836,000	375,000
Nottinghamshire	5,787,000	832,000
Sussex	295,000	—
Warwickshire	368,000	—
North Yorkshire	720,000	—
South Yorkshire	1,225,000	—

Prisoners (Magazines)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons do not allow magazines to be brought in by visitors to prisoners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The general practice provided for by standing order 4 is that newspapers and periodicals are received direct from publishers, newsagents or booksellers. No information is held centrally which would indicate the extent to which governors may exceptionally allow magazines also to be brought in at visits.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons have arrangements with neighbouring shops that only magazines ordered through those shops can be supplied to prisoners; what is the financial basis upon which these arrangements are entered into; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Providing they comply in other respects with the rules governing their receipt by prisoners, newspapers, periodicals and books may be supplied either at the order of a relative or friend of an inmate, or by payment from the inmate's private cash or, through the canteen, from the inmate's earnings. Details of local arrangements for the supply of publications through the canteen could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Correspondence)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the procedure by which letters to prisoners in a foreign language are vetted; and what is the average time delay this involves.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 17 November 1986 Official Report, column 28. Records are not kept of the average time taken to censor correspondence in a foreign language: in any given case, if a translation is considered necessary, the time it takes will depend to a great extent on the availability of a translator for the language in question, and on the length of the letter.

Civil Defence

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much is being spent by South Glamorgan county council on civil defence up until the present time on (a) equipment, (b) shelters and (c) staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The latest financial information available is the estimate received from the Council on 30 September 1985:

	1985-86 £	1986-87 £
Equipment and premises	21,700	22,730
Shelters	—	—
Staff etc.	86,530	96,230
	108,230	118,960

Crime Rate

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received regarding the increased crime rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: I receive numerous representations on all aspects of crime. Our strategy for fighting crime is practical and realistic: we are providing the police, the courts, the probation service and the prison system with additional resources. We are vigorously pursuing improvements in crime prevention techniques and encouraging crime prevention initiatives in the development of wider social policy. At a meeting of the Home Office standing conference on crime prevention earlier this week, working groups on residential burglary, car security, shop theft, commercial robbery and violence associated with licensed premises, presented reports offering a wealth of advice on good practice and recommendations for future action.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many meetings have taken place between his officials in the last year that discussed the replacement strategy for the police national computer; what is the state of readiness of any new operational specification; when he expects to announce a police national computer strategy; if he will place a copy or summary of the operational specification in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Regular meetings are held between officials to discuss the replacement strategy for the police national computer. We expect to make a decision on this strategy during 1987. For security reasons we do not intend to make the operational specification widely available, and I do not consider therefore that it would be right to place it in the Library.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many names have been weeded from the criminal names index of the police national computer in accordance with the policy announced on 14 March; what was the size of the index on 14 March; and what is the current size of the index.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: All records which have been considered for weeding under the old criteria are being re-examined in the light of the criteria announced on 14 March 1986. As of 31 October 1986, 23,059 names had been removed from the criminal names index of the police national computer by this process. The number of entries in the index is calculated weekly. On 15 March 1986 the index contained 5,089,272 entries; on 8 November 1986 it contained 5,138,826 entries.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Charles Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Liverpool prison in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally once a week. On 14 November 1986 HM prison Liverpool held 1,278 prisoners.

Mr. Rajadurai Srirangarajan

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department is he will publish in the Official Report the letters he has received from the hon. Member for Leyton concerning Mr. Rajadurai Srirangarajan who has been detained by immigration since his arrival in the United Kingdom on 5 July; why he has sent no reply to any of these letters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I replied to the hon. Member on 17 November 1986.

Metropolitan Police (Publicity)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the total spending of the Metropolitan Police on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that staffing and accommodation costs of the Directorate of Public Affairs and spending on recruitment and other advertising and other promotional literature totalled £3,622,861 in 1985-86. The estimate for 1986-87 is £4,184,294. Total costs for earlier years are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many press and public relations staff are employed in the Metropolitan Police; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the number of staff in the information officer grades employeed in the directorate of public affairs on 31 October 1986 was 39. The number at the end of each financial year from 1979-80 is as follows:

	Number
31 March 1980	30
31 March 1981	29
31 March 1982	29
31 March 1983	27
31 March 1984	35
31 March 1985	31
31 March 1986	35

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the estimated spending by the Metropolitan Police on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that expenditure by the Metropolitan Police on all forms of recruitment and other advertising, and other promotional literature, in each financial year from 1979-80 to 1985-86 and the estimated expenditure for 1986-87 as follows:

1980-81	967,000
1981-82	1,062,000
1982-83	1,028,000

A breakdown of this expenditure is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: During this financial year the Home Office plans to spend an estimated £3 million on advertising, plus a further 1·6 million spent partly by the Home Office and partly by NTVLRO on the TV licence anti-evasion campaign. It is not yet possible to say how expenditure will finally be divided between television, radio and press. Approximately £1·3 million is likely to be spent on the production of promotional literature and related printing.

Figures for expenditure on newspapers and television advertising for 1979-80 to 1983-84 were covered by answers which appeared in Hansard on 8 May 1984 and those for the 1984-85 financial year by replies in the edition which appeared on 6 December 1985.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Hurd: The budget for the Home Office public relations branch for 1986-87 is £704,000. Figures for earlier years are as follows:

These figures include salary, accommodation and service costs.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Hurd: Staff in the information officer grades in post in the Home Office public relations branch on 1 November 1986 numbered 27. The figures of information officer staff in post on 1 January each year were as follows:

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the spending of the Metropolitan police on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The 1986-87 estimate for payments by the Metropolitan police to outside management and computer consultants is £440,000. Equivalent payments for 1984-85 and 1985-86 were £346,000 and £433,000 respectively. The payments include expenses and VAT as well as fees. Separate information on fees alone or for the years prior to 1984-85 is not readily available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) the number and (b) the clear-up rate of crimes committed in England and Wales in each category of crime recorded as one of violence against the person or sexual offences, in 1978 and 1985.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The numbers of notifiable offences recorded and cleared up by the police in each offence category are published each year in the command paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (Chapter 2) and most recently in a Home Office Statistical Bulletin (Table 5 of issue number 4/86). The figures for violence against the person and sexual offences in 1978 and 1985 are summarised in the following table.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales

	1978		1985

Sexual offences	22,367	76	21,456	72

Glue Sniffing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on action being taken to combat glue sniffing.

Mrs. Currie: I have been asked to reply.

A number of measures have been taken in line with the Government's policy of education, persuasion, and the encouragement of local initiatives including:

— the production of "Illusions", a training film for professional workers in health, social services, education etc;

— the production of leaflets for parents and professionals by the Health Education Council;

— the issue of guidelines on voluntary restraint in retail sales of solvent based products to young people;

— the enaction of Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act 1985 which makes it an offence to supply a substance to someone under 18 if it is done in the knowledge or belief that the substance is likely to be used to achieve intoxification.

Finally, the Department of Trade and Industry is co-sponsoring a video training film for retailers and their staff giving guidance on the sale of products likely to be sniffed.

SCOTLAND

EC (Intervention Stores)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to enable an environmental health officer to investigate food held in European Economic Community intervention food stores.

Mr. John MacKay: No. I am satisfied that the high standards of storage, hygiene and monitoring currently in operation do not require additional checks to be carried out.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the average amount of food held within European Economic Community intervention foodstores within Tayside region since January; and if he will break these figures down by type of food and quantity stored and their location.

Mr. John MacKay: As intervention stocks fluctuate from day to day, an average of the stock in individual stores is not recorded. The stocks in Tayside stores at 1 January and 30 September this year were:

Location	January Tonnes	September Tonnes
Butter
Dundee	540	540
Barley
Stracathro	83,506	89,562
Beef
Dundee	679	693

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the year in which food was first stored in European Economic Community intervention food stores in each location in Tayside; and what was the average amount stored in each location in its first year of operation.

Mr. John MacKay: I regret that this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many deaths from cervical cancer have occurred within Tayside health board in each year since 1980.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of deaths classified as being due to cervical cancer (ICD[1] 180) as the underlying cause of death in the Tayside health board area are as follows:

	Numbers
1980	15
1981	16
1982	13
1983	10
1984	13
1985	19

Duke Street Hospital, Glasgow

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make a statement on the day care facilities for the elderly at Duke Street hospital, Glasgow;

(2) if he will itemise the work and costs which Mr. Laurence Peterkin of the Greater Glasgow health board ordered to be carried out when he last visited Duke Street hospital, Glasgow.

Mr. John MacKay: These are matters for the Greater Glasgow health board and my noble Friend the Minister of State will ask the chairman of the board to write to the hon. Member.

Chernobyl Accident

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what assessment he has made as to how many children in Scotland (a) unborn, (b) aged up to 12 months, (c) aged 12 months to five years and (d) aged five years to 16 years on 2 May 1986 are as a result of the Chernobyl accident likely to receive first-year radiation doses of 1 millisievert or more to (i) the whole body and (ii) the thyroid gland; and what the values of dose received will be by 1 millisievert bands;

(2) what assessment he has made of the maximum radiation doses (a) to the whole body and (b) to the thyroid gland which might be received by any individual

Scottish child as a result of the Chernobyl accident in the year May 1986 to May 1987 and in the four years May 1987 to May 1991.

Mr. John MacKay: The controls applied following the deposition of radioactivity from the Chernobyl accident were designed to ensure that people in Scotland were protected in accordance with the recommendations of the International Commission on Radiation Protection and the advice of the National Radiological Protection Board. That advice includes lower and upper values of radiation dose at which counter-measures should be considered, and taken, respectively. The most restrictive of the recommended lower levels are 5 millisieverts and 50 millisieverts, for the whole body and the thyroid respectively. Early estimates of radiation dose, published by the NRPB, indicated doses below these levels. The NRPB is currently undertaking more detailed calculations: the results will be published shortly.

Abortions

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number of deaths attributed to legal abortion in Scotland in each of the years 1960 to 1985 inclusive.

Mr. John MacKay: The available figures, which are classified by the International Classification of Diseases (ICD), are as follows. Figures for deaths due to abortions before 1968 did not distinguish between legal and other abortions.

Protection Orders

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the River Tummel Protection Order under the Fresh Water and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976 has been renewed.

Mr. John MacKay: The River Tummel Catchment Area Protection Order 1983 was renewed by the River Tummel Catchment Area Protection (Renewal) Order 1986. The renewal order came into operation on 15 March 1986 and is valid until 6 October 1988.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list all the current protection orders under the Fresh Water and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976 and their dates of inception and termination.

Mr. John MacKay: Protection orders have been granted or renewed in respect of five areas. The current orders with their duration are given below:

The Upper Spey and Associated Waters Protection (Renewal) Order 1985—15 March 1985 to 6 October 1987

The Rivers Tweed and Eye Protection (Renewal) Order 1986—15 March 1986 to 6 October 1988

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Rifkind: The running costs of the Scottish information office in 1986-87, including the cost of paid publicity, are estimated at about £1·6 million. This compares with approximately £1·4 million in 1985-86. Directly comparable figures for years prior to the introduction of new Scottish Office budgetary arrangements in 1985-86 are not available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Rifkind: The number of staff in the information officer grades employed in the Scottish information office at 1 April each year since 1979 was as follows:

	Number
1979	22
1980	24
1981	20
1982	22
1983	20
1984	20

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Rifkind: The following information on spending on consultancy fees is readily available

	1984-85[1] £	1985-86 £	1986-87[2] £

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(2) what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio, newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(3) what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Tebbit: I have no ministerial responsibility for vote-borne departmental expenditure.

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Tebbit: I have no ministerial responsibility for departmental manpower allocations; those Civil Service staff who work in my office are not engaged in press and public relations activity.

EMPLOYMENT

Service Industries

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Paymaster General what information he has about the increase in job creation in retail sales in Britain's high streets and commercial centres over the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at different dates.

Between June 1981 and June 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, there was an estimated net increase of 200,000 in the numbers of employees in employment and the self-employed in retail distribution in Great Britain.

Mr. Marland asked the Paymaster General what estimate he has made of the increase in jobs in the service industries over the last five years; and what trend the figures show.

Mr. Lee: Between June 1981 and June 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, there was a net increase of 1,243,000 in the numbers of employees in employment and the self-employed in the service industries in Great Britain.

The figures show that there has been a continuing upward trend in employment in the service industries since 1982.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Cohen asked the Paymaster General if he will provide the Treasury's estimate of unemployment totals for each quarter in the current financial year.

Mr. Lee: The Government do not forecast unemployment figures. However, following are the total numbers of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom in the first three quarters of the 1986-87 financial year:

	Numbers
10 April 1986	3,325,058
10 July 1986	3,279,594
9 October 1986	3,237,154

Local Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Cash asked the Paymaster General how many local enterprise agencies have now been established; and how much money the Government have contributed to them in total.

Mr. Trippier: There are currently 352 local enterprise agencies in the United Kingdom, of which 266 are in England. Government support for these latter agencies is channelled through my Department (until 1985 the Department of Trade and Industry), the Department of the Environment, the Home Office and the Development Commission. My Department's support, together with that formerly provided by the Department of Trade and Industry, is expected to exceed £3 million by the end of this financial year. Funding figures from other Government sources are however not easily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

HSE (Agricultural Inspectorate)

Mr. Neale asked the Paymaster General what is the full complement of the Agricultural Inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive; and how many staff are currently in post.

Mr. Trippier: On 1 November 1986 there were 244 staff in post in the Agricultural Inspectorate, including 165 agricultural inspectors. This figure is slightly above the planned figure of 162 inspectors for the current financial year because of recent recruitment in anticipation of forthcoming wastage.

Restart Scheme

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General if he will set out the regional figures for Restart interviews and corresponding reductions in claimant numbers setting out in each area the numbers that he would have anticipated leaving the benefit claimant list in line with the rates persisting prior to Restart.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information (cumulative to 9 October) is set out in the table.

	Number interviewed	Number who ceased to claim benefit following interview
South East	28,647	2,855
London	46,530	2,431
South West	16,925	1,461
West Midlands	38,778	2,397
East Midlands	26,336	2,358
Yorks and Humberside	34,359	3,100
North West	74,134	5,280
Northern	34,469	3,842
Wales	22,049	2,776
Scotland	44,224	3,718
Total Great Britain	366,451	30,218

It is impossible to say how many of these people would have left the count anyway, to go into work, training, or self-employment or for other reasons. Comparisons with reductions in the count in the period before restart was operating do not provide any basis for any estimate because of changes in other factors affecting the unemployment count, such as seasonal factors and changes in the economic climate.

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General if he will set out the following details concerning Restart with the latest cumulative figures and also the cumulative figures for the periods ending on the dates four weeks and eight weeks previously, broken down into Manpower Services Commission administrative regions and the totals for the United Kingdom as a whole (a) numbers invited to attend an interview, (b) numbers not attending when a second letter has been sent, (c) numbers originally invited since ceasing to claim benefit, (d) the normal or mean rate of claimants in the categories called for interviews ceasing to claim benefit for similar periods prior to Restart, (e) (c) less (d), (f) the numbers who have never attended the first interview nor ceased to claim benefit and (g) the numbers to whom a Manpower Services Commission offer has been made, on a numerical and a percentage basis; and if he will make a statement on regional variations, with particular regard to (f) above.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information on items (a) (b) (c) and (g) is set out in the tables.

I can give the number of people who cease to claim benefit in answer to item (c), but we have no means of knowing why they ceased to claim or how many moved into employment, self-employment or training. So far as those people are concerned, we do not know the number who would have ceased to claim anyway, to go into work, training, self-employment or for some other reason without being invited to a Restart interview.

As regards items (d) and (e), it is very difficult to compare numbers of people who cease to claim in current periods with those in earlier periods because of changes in other factors affecting unemployment, such as seasonal variations and changes in the economic climate.

As regards item (f), information would be available only at disproportionate cost on the numbers not attending a first interview who are still claiming benefit. They would include people who are interviewed after a second invitation as well as some who have interviews after being referred to the unemployment benefit service.

European Social Fund

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the priority being given to disabled people within the European social fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No. The European Commission's guidelines for applications to the European social fund in 1987 removed the possibility of support from the fund for schemes providing vocational training for disabled people, combined with a substantial degree of adaptation of workplaces. The United Kingdom and a number of other Member states opposed both this change and another put forward by the European Commission which would have limited social fund support for other measures for disabled people capable of working in the open labour market to the "absolute priority" regions of the Community. In the event the latter proposal was not pursued.

Notwithstanding the narrowing of the possibilities for fund support for disabled people under the 1987 guidelines, United Kingdom applications for such support have increased from 188 for 1986 to 206 for 1987, with a corresponding increase in the total value of assistance sought from £28 million to £49 million. In addition, disabled people are, of course, eligible to benefit from other employment and training programmes supported by the fund which are not specifically directed towards helping the disabled.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General if he will list for each of the last five years the amount spent on projects for disabled people within the European social fund and the proportion of total expenditure of the fund that this represented; and what are the current estimates for 1987.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to list the total amount allocated from the European social fund to schemes for disabled people because some schemes specifically for young disabled people receive funding under provisions of the fund other than those specifically reserved for the disabled. In addition, individual disabled people may benefit from fund assistance by participating in schemes supported by the fund which are open to both the disabled and the able bodied.

The following table therefore shows for the last five years for which figures are available the assistance allocated by the fund under the specific guideline or guidelines reserved for measures to help disabled people:

	Amount allocated (Millions ECU European Unit of Currency)	Proportion of total allocations (per cent.)
1981	80·78	8·0
1982	122·44	8·0
1983	167·51	8·9
1984	104·36	5·6
1985[1]	140·57	6·3

[1] Provisional.

Applications for European social fund support in 1987 are currently being considered by the European Commission and no estimate of likely allocations can be made at this stage.

Benefits (Work Test)

Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General how many people refused benefit in the availability for work-test pilot areas have had their benefit restored by the independent adjudicators; and if he will give the figures for each of the pilot areas concerned.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: During the period of the experiment 26 claimants who had been disallowed benefit by the independent adjudication authorities on grounds of availability subsequently had their claims allowed following appeal. There are a further 21 appeals still under consideration. The figures for each experimental office are as follows:

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the total spending of the Manpower Services Commission on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table:

	Head Office Non-pay	Pay	Regional Service Pay/Non-Pay	Total

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the estimated spending by the Manpower Services Commission on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table:

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the spending of the Manpower Services Commission on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Outside consultants are employed by the Manpower Services Commission in a number of specialisms and the figures have been provided for management and computer consultants which can be separately identified. Continual expansion within the MSC and changes in the accounting systems make the extraction of yearly figures difficult and the reply has been retricted to the current year (1986-87), 1985-86 and 1984-85. The remainder could be given only at disproportionate cost. Fees expected to be paid to outside consultants in 1986-87 are £2·2 million, and those paid in 1985-86 and 1984-85 are £1 million and £1·1 million respectively.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General how many press and public relations staff are employed in the Manpower Services Commission; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers of press and public relations information staff employed in MSC are:

	Press and PR Officers	Total including Marketing and publicity officers
1986-87	8	32½
1985-86	8	37
1984-85	8	39
1983-84	8	33

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department, excluding our agencies, has paid fees to outside consultants (management and computer) as follows: 1984-85 £355,000, 1985-86 £411,000, 1986-87 (estimate) £346,000. Information for the earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Expenditure on the promotion of schemes by the media and literature by our Department from 1979-1986 was as follows:

1979-80	72,922
1980-81	320,707
1981-82	409,462
1982-83	361,226
1983-84	499,040
1984-85	321,981
1985-86	1,225,373

The amount spent so far, and the amount planned and committed, for 1986-87 is £8,363,382·10.

Note: Figures for television, radio, newspaper advertising and promotional literature are not available separately.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Details of the numbers of information officer group staff employed in the Department of Employment group are as follows:

SOCIAL SERVICES

Claimants (Rent Charges)

67. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans his Department has to prevent landlords charging excessively high rents to those claiming housing benefit.

Mr. Lyell: Statutory responsibility for administering the housing benefit scheme exists with local authorities, who have powers to restrict the amount of rent eligible for benefit if they consider that the rent is unreasonably high.

We are at present consulting with the local authority associations on a range of options designed, as part of the housing benefit reforms to be implemented in April 1988, to strengthen local authorities' powers to act in such cases.

Residential Care

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implementation of his guidelines for residential care for the elderly.

Mrs. Currie: The Department's Social Services Inspectorate has been carrying out a two-year study of the effects of the new legislation on registration and inspection of residential care homes which took effect on 1 January 1985. The study will also take into account the operation by local authorities of "Home Life", the code of practice for residential care drawn up by an independent working party under the auspices of the Centre for Policy on Ageing and commended as guidance by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Social Services and Wales. The inspectorate's report is expected early next year.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how much was paid in board and lodging allowances by the three local offices serving the Birmingham, Perry Barr constituency, namely, Walsall road, Soho road and Kingsbury road in the latest period for which figures are available; and how this compares with one, three and six years previously;

(2) how many of the current payments in respect of bed-and-breakfast accommodation by his local offices at Walsall road, Soho road and Kingsbury road, Birmingham are at the maximum rate; and what percentage these are of the current total;

(3) what is the number of board-and-lodging payments at the latest convenient date; and what percentage of these are at the maximum rate.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information requested on amounts and on maximum levels of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowances is not collected separately by individual local offices and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information which is available for Great Britain from the annual statistical inquiry for the six latest years, on numbers of boarders, overall spending and average payments is set out in the table. The inquiry does not identify the number of payments at the maximum rate, and the sample size precludes the provision of reliable figures for small areas.

Supplementary benefit Great Britain
Claimants in ordinary board and lodging

Year	Number	Annual spending (on basis of December figures) £ million	Average payment £
1979	41,000	52	20·40
1980	55,000	76	26·60
1981	69,000	115	32·15
1982	85,000	166	37·80
1983	112,000	278	47·87
1984	164,000	503	59·37

Notes:

(i) Data are taken from the Annual Statistical Enquiry showing the position at December of each year.

(ii) Average benefit figures include the personal expenses allowance, but are net of other income, such as unemployment benefit, which falls to be taken into account in the supplementary benefit assessment.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what action his local offices take to check the quality and quantity of breakfasts where social security benefits are used to pay bed-and-breakfast charges;

(2) what action his local offices take to check that charges for bed-and-breakfast accommodation for those in receipt of benefit are the same for those not in receipt of benefit at the same establishment.

Mr. Lyell: The Department cannot intervene in claimants' decisions on how to spend their own money, but local offices do notify apparently sub-standard accommodation to local authorities, which are responsible for protecting all consumers, whether or not in receipt of state benefits. No claimant can receive more than a maximum amount for charges (£55 per week in Birmingham), set in the light of information about charges and the operation of the accommodation market, and taking into account the Government's view of what it is reasonable for the taxpayer to meet.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list by amount the 10 establishments in respect of which the largest payments of board-and-lodging allowances in Birmingham and the west midlands have been made in the latest convenient period; and if he will list the reasons why such establishments cannot be identified;

(2) what information he has regarding the numbers and size of establishments in Birmingham, and the west midlands in which claimants in receipt of board-and-lodging allowances are living.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that information from benefit claims about the names and addresses of board and lodging premises is confidential and cannot be disclosed. I also regret that comprehensive information on the numbers and size of board and lodging establishments is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Benefit

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of fraud in the housing benefit system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: The housing benefit scheme is administered by local authorities who are responsible for investigating and dealing with instances of fraud. No information is available centrally which would enable an estimate to be made of the amount of housing benefit overpaid as a result of fraud.

Mentally Ill People (Services)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on the provision of services for the mentally ill;

(2) if he will make a statement on the provision of accommodation in the community for patients discharged from hospitals and mental institutions.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Disabled Persons (Kensington and Chelsea)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department has received from councillor Neil J. Kearney of the Royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea concerning discrimination by the council against residents with disabilities; what action is being taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I have received a letter from Councillor Neil J. Kearney of the Royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea alleging discrimination by the council against disabled residents. Although the question of parking spaces for disabled people is a matter for the local authority concerned, I have asked officials to send a copy of Councillor Kearney's letter to the Royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea asking for their comments.

"Not a Penny to Call My Own"

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration his Department has given to the report on poverty in mental illness and mental handicap hospitals entitled "Not a Penny to Call My Own", published by the King's Fund and Disability Alliance, a copy of which has been sent to him; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: We are currently studying the report and I shall write to the right hon. Member very shortly.

Hepatitis B

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to include hepatitis B as a designated industrial disease.

Mr. Major: Viral hepatitis, including hepatitis B, has been prescribed as an industrial disease (prescribed disease B8) under the provisions of Section 76 of the Social Security Act 1975 since 2 February 1976. From 3 December 1984 the terms of prescription were widened to cover all employed earners in occupations involving contact with human blood or human blood products, or with a source of viral hepatitis.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Mark Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many amputees were refused mobility allowance in each of the last five years.

Mr. Major: I regret that records are not maintained of the nature of the disability of unsuccessful mobility allowance claimants.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations the Government have received from (a) voluntary and (b) statutory organisations concerning the difficulties being experienced by disabled people in proving eligibility for mobility allowance.

Mr. Major: We have not received any recent representations from statutory organisations. We regularly receive representations from voluntary organisations acting on behalf of claimants who are appealing against decisions of the independent adjudicating authorities, and about extending the eligibility criteria for the allowance.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has on (a) the cause and (b) the type of disability of people who (i) apply for, (ii) are in receipt of or (iii) are refused mobility allowance;

(2) how many people in receipt of mobility allowance are (a) mentally handicapped, (b) mentally disturbed or (c) blind with other physical disability.

Mr. Major: I regret that information is not available in the form requested. The information which is available relates to recipients of the allowance and, at 7 November, was as follows:

	Number
Neoplasms	9,193
Endocrine, nutritional and metabolic diseases	3,259
Diseases of blood and blood forming organs	1,037
Diseases of the central nervous system	131,476
Diseases of the circulatory system	62,317
Diseases of the respiratory system	42,278
Diseases of bones and organs of movement	142,510
Congenial malformations	14,472
Amputations	7,487
Diseases of digestive system; genito-urinary system; skin and cellular tissue	13,168
Total	427,197

In addition, there were 25,403 recipients of the allowance who were formerly beneficiaries of the invalid vehicle scheme, but the nature of their disability is not recorded.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people (a) are in receipt of mobility allowance or (b) have applied unsuccessfully for mobility allowance in each of the last two years.

Mr. Major: The number of people in receipt of mobility allowance as at 7 November 1986 was 452,000. In the year up to that date there were 47,300 unsuccessful claims to the allowance. The corresponding figure for the year from November 1984 to November 1985 was 37,600.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on mobility allowance in the light of the decision in the House of Lords in the case of Christine Lees and the tribunal of Commissioners' decision, reference CM/173/1985.

Mr. Major: We believe that these decisions resolve many of the difficulties which have emerged in recent years over the interpretation of the qualifying conditions for the allowance. In particular, the tribunal of Commissioners decision CM/173/85 endorsed the principles laid down in an earlier decision of a Social Security Commissioner which led to amendment of the regulations in 1979, and provides further guidance about the application of these principles. We appreciate that there are some disabled people with mobility problems who do not come within the scope of the allowance, but this does not stem from these decisions as it is clear that the qualifying criteria embodied in the 1979 amendment regulations were not intended to bring such people within the scope of the allowance.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish new guidelines for medical boards on mobility allowance.

Mr. Major: New guidance, including information on changes arising from the introduction of common provisions for adjudication under the Social Security Act 1986 and regulations, will be issued to medical boards early next year.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Major: The expenditure by the Department in 1984-85, 1985-86 and the estimated expenditure for 1986-87 is as follows:

Year	£ Million
1984-85	7·600
1985-86	13·646
1986-87	17·000

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(2) what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(3) how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Drug Misuse (Videos)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider distributing the Grange Hill anti-drug abuse video "Just Say No" with his Department's educational video "Double Take"; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We welcome the Grange Hill initiative as a helpful contribution to raising public awareness about drug misuse. We have however no plans to become involved in the distribution of the "Just Say No" video. The "Double Take" video package was first publicised in January and copies have now been despatched to three-quarters of all secondary schools. Although free copies remain available, distribution of the package has largely been completed.

DEFENCE

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence what guidelines have been issued to the armed forces warning of the risks of acquired immune deficiency syndrome and means of prevention.

Mr. Freeman: Posters have been distributed throughout the services warning of the risks of contracting the HIV virus. A personal copy of the Health Education Council leaflet "AIDS: what everybody needs to know" is in the process of being distributed to every service man and service woman in Her Majesty's Forces at home and abroad.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what consideration has been given in the new North Atlantic Treaty Organisation political guidelines on use of nuclear weapons to the effects of fall-out from initial nuclear strikes on the civil populations of east and west Europe;

(2) whether the new guidance for use of nuclear weapons adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20-21 October includes a more extensive range of options for nuclear strikes on Soviet territory than the guidelines which they replace;

(3) whether the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20-21 October include provision for the use of nuclear weapons at sea;

(4) what consideration has been given in the new North Atlantic Treaty Organisation political guidelines on use of nuclear weapons to follow-on nuclear strikes;

(5) whether the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20 to 21 October include provision for single "demonstration" nuclear strikes designed to send a political signal of intention to escalate;

(6) whether the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20-21 October take account of the possibility of removal of all Pershing 2 and ground-launched cruise missiles from western Europe.

Mr. Stanley: The new guidelines codify and consolidate existing NATO doctrine and reinforce the fundamental principle in NATO that political control over any use of nuclear weapons is maintained at all times. The guidelines are classified; it is therefore not possible for me to comment in detail on their content.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether North Atlantic Treaty Organisation political guidelines existed for the use of British marine tactical nuclear weapons prior to the adoption of new guidelines by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20 and 21 October;

(2) in what circumstances it was envisaged British maritime tactical nuclear weapons might be used prior to the adoption of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation guidelines for their use at Gleneagles on 20 to 21 October.

Mr. Stanley: Provisional political guidelines for the use of nuclear weapons in defence of NATO were established in 1969. They were approved by Ministers at a meeting of the NATO nuclear planning group on 12 November 1969. I cannot comment in detail on the provisions of the guidelines which are classified.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the provisions for use of nuclear weapons at sea, contained in the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons, adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20 to 21 October, apply to British maritime tactical nuclear weapons.

Mr. Stanley: The general political guidelines encompass all nuclear weapons assigned to NATO including British maritime tactical weapons.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons adopted by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20-21 October alter the degree of discretion allowed to military commanders to translate political guidelines into operational practice.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) on 23 October at column 1296.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation colleagues on the replacement of United States Navy Poseidon warheads assigned to SACEUR by (a) United States Navy Trident warheads and (b) United States Navy Tomahawk nuclear cruise missiles.

Mr. Stanley: None.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he expects to be informed by the United States authorities when a new United States nuclear weapon system is deployed in Britain or its territorial waters.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend would expect to be consulted by the United States authorities if they propose to base a new class of nuclear weapons in Britain. But in accordance with long-standing policy neither the United States Government nor the British Government confirm or deny the presence of nuclear weapons at specific locations or on visiting warships.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the new guidelines for use of nuclear weapons adopted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers at Gleneagles on 20-21 October change the procedures by which United States nuclear forces are reassigned from national to North Atlantic Treaty Organisation command in time of crisis or war.

Mr. Stanley: The guidelines are not concerned with the procedures for the assignment of national forces to NATO.

Defence Scientific Advisory Council

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many academics or scientists from universities or other institutions of higher education sit on the Defence Scientific Advisory Council.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Research Contracts and Agreements

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Chemical Defence Establishment at Porton Down and the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment at Aldermaston have any research contracts or agreements with any universities or other institutions of higher education; how many; and with which universities or institutions of higher education.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Chemical Defence Establishment, Porton Down, has currently 65 research contracts or agreements with 36 universities and other institutions of higher education. The Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston, has 30 contracts or agreements with 18 universities and other institutions of higher education. It is for the individual universities and institutions concerned to decide whether to make this information available.

Holy Loch

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the current UK-US memorandum of agreement on the use of naval facilities in the Holy Loch by the United States Navy expires.

Mr. Stanley: Details of the agreements between the United Kingdom and United States Governments for the use of the Holy Loch by the United States Navy are confidential between the two Governments.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any of the following classes of submarine make use of the naval facilities at Holy Loch (a) Lafayette and Benjamin Franklin class SSBNs armed with the Trident I (C-4) missile, (b) SSN-637 Sturgeon class and (c) SSN-668 Los Angeles class.

Mr. Stanley: As far as Trident I (C-4) missile-armed submarines are concerned, I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 7 November at column 641. I understand that the SSNs using the Holy Loch have included those of the Sturgeon and Los Angeles classes.

Expenditure

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has about the level of defence spending in the current year and 1985, expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product of the United Kingdom, Eire, Finland, Sweden, Switzerland, Austria, Yugoslavia and Albania, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: Using the national definition of defence expenditure, the United Kingdom's defence budget accounted for 5·0 per cent. of GDP in 1985-86, and is expected to account for 4·9 per cent. in the current financial year. Comparable figures for the other countries mentioned are not available. Information concerning these countries is published by the International Institute of Strategic Studies in "The Military Balance 1986-87", page 212.

Nuclear Weapon Tests

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has about how many nuclear weapon tests have been carried out since the Soviet moratorium of August 1985.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Since 1 August 1985 the United Kingdom has conducted two nuclear weapons tests in co-operation with the United States.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the total spending of each of the armed forces on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: The last year for which comprehensive figures are available is 1985-86. Total spending on press and public relations activity for each of the armed forces during that year and during 1983-84 and 1984-85 was as follows:

£ million

Service	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Royal Navy/Royal Marines	1·2	1·1	1·2
Army	1·2	1·5	1·4
Royal Air Force	0·2	0·3	0·5
Total	2·6	2·9	3·1

Details of total expenditure for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 could not be obtained without disproportionate expense. The figures provided include annual staffing costs together with expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications, equipment, etc.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: The last year for which comprehensive figures are available is 1985-86 when total spending on MOD press and public relations activity was £6·7 million. Figures for the period 1982-83 to 1984-85 were as follows:

Year	Costs £ million
1982-83	5·1
1983-84	6·3
1984-85	6·8

Details of total expenditure for the years 1979-80 to 1981-82 could not be obtained without disproportionate expense. The figures provided include annual staffing costs together with expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications, equipment, etc.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the estimated spending by each of the armed forces on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: I shall reply shortly.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: I shall reply shortly.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many press and public relations staff are employed in each of the armed forces; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: The total number of press and public relations staff currently employed in each of the armed forces is as follows:

	Number
Royal Navy/ Royal Marines	15½

	Number
Army	38
Royal Air Force	10
Total	63½

Comparative figures for the years 1983-84 to 1985-86 are:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Royal Navy/ Royal Marines	26	18½	16½
Army	51	45	38
Royal Air Force	5	6	9
Total	82	69½	63½

Figures for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 are not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate expense.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: The number of service personnel and civilians currently employed on press and public relations work in the MOD is 239½. The number of staff employed in the years 1982-83 to 1985-86 is as follows:

	Number
1982-83	222
1983-84	290
1984-85	282½
1985-86	249½

Figures for 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 are not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate expense. The numbers given for 1983-84, onwards include all service personnel and civilians in complemented PR and PR support posts in London and in commands and districts at home and overseas; the 1982-83 figure was not prepared on this comprehensive basis.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what is was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence makes extensive use of outside consultants in its various areas of business. Records are held centrally only for management and computer consultancies. Estimated expenditure for 1986-87 and actual expenditure for 1984-85 and 1985-86 is as follows:

	£ million
1984-85	2·0
1985-86	3·8
1986-87	14·5

Figures for earlier years cannot be produced without disproportionate effort.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the spending of each of the armed forces on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Freeman: Expenditure on centrally arranged management and computer consultancies is not attributed to individual service departments and to attempt to do so would involve disproportionate effort.

THE ARTS

National Theatre (Anniversary)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make additional funds available to the National theatre to mark its 10th anniversary on the South Bank in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 18 November 1986]: Such a decision would be for the Arts Council; the Council's clients are usually funded on the basis of specific needs.

Royal Opera House

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what representation he has received concerning the financial position of the Royal Opera house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 18 November 1986]: Funding of the Royal Opera house is a matter for the Arts Council. The Chairman of the opera house has kept me informed of his discussions with the Arts Council about the opera house's financial position.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Spending

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide the Treasury's estimate of public spending totals for each quarter in (i) the current financial year and (ii) the next financial year.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government do not publish forward estimates for the public expenditure planning totals by quarter. Historical quarterly outturn data for the planning total are published by the Central Statistical Office, and the outturn in the first quarter of 1986-87 (the latest period for which such information is available) is £32,143 million.[1] As indicated in the "Autumn Statement" (Cml 4), the estimated outturn for 1986-87 as a whole is £140·4 billion, and the planning total for 1987-88 has now been set at £148·6 billion.

Government Income and Expenditure

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate for each year since 1979, and provide estimates for 1987, of (i) proceeds to the Treasury from North sea oil revenues, (ii) proceeds from public asset sales, (iii) expenditure on unemployment benefit and (iv) total expenditure on social security benefits.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is as follows:

Departmental Purchasing

Mr. Holt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government have had a progress report on departmental purchasing from the Central Unit on Purchasing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Director of the Central Unit on Purchasing submitted an interim progress report in August. This shows that Departments have made progress in improving their purchasing and supply activities and made value for money improvements of around £70 million in 1985-86. Further improvements in excess of £100 million are targeted for the present year. This is commendable, but the Unit's Director believes there is room for further substantial improvements.

The central unit is working with Departments to install basic information systems and to improve the expertise and resources needed to enable them to carry out their purchasing and supply activities in a more professional manner. Some Departments have already taken positive steps in this direction. However, further significant progress is needed if Departments are to be able fully to implement Government purchasing policies. The unit is giving priority to helping Departments establish much more challenging value for money targets in the future. They will also be assisting Departments in such areas as control of major capital projects and competitive tendering.

Inflation

Mr. Freeson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual rate of inflation for 1985-86; what is the rate of inflation for April to October 1986; and what is the latest estimate of the annualised expected rate of inflation for 1986-87.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In 1985-86 the RPI was 5·9 per cent. and the GDP deflator 6·1 per cent. higher than in 1984-85. Between April and October 1986 the RPI increased by 0·8 per cent. A forecast of 3 per cent. for inflation in 1986-87 as measured by the increase in the GDP deflator was given in the "Autumn Statement".

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(2) how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(3) what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(4) what will be the total spending of all Government departments and agencies on press and public relations this year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Direct Trader Input (Dover)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cause of the delays to goods traffic at Dover in connection with the introduction by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise of the direct trader input system; what action has been taken to minimise such delays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 18 November 1986]: Some problems have arisen at Dover as a result of the introduction of a new computer system connecting the port trading community with the Customs and Excise freight processing computer. The new computer system has been developed by the Dover harbour board to provide port users at Dover and Folkestone with a comprehensive port information and clearance system.

Customs and Excise has introduced special measures to reduce the delays to freight traffic and is co-operating fully with the Dover harbour board to ensure that the computer problems are resolved as quickly as possible.

ENERGY

Nuclear Power

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Energy what would be the effect on energy costs of the phasing out of nuclear power in Great Britain.

Mr. Goodlad: The effect would be to raise the price of electricity. The extent to which it rose would depend on factors such as the time-table of the phase-out and the paths of fossil fuel prices. Nuclear power continues to have an important role to play in energy supply.

Sizewell (Report)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy not to reach a decision on the Layfield report on Sizewell until after the report has been debated in the House.

Mr. Peter Walker: I shall wish to see and consider the report before I reach a view on the timing of a debate in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Gas Consumption

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the increase in gas consumption in the first quarter of 1986, second quarter of 1986, third quarter of 1986 and October 1986 all as against the same periods of 1985 and 1984.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Information on gas consumption is published in the Department of Energy's monthly bulletin "Energy Trends" copies of which are in the Library of the House.

British Gas

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will state the total cost of the privatisation of British Gas;

(2) what has been the total cost of the advertising and promotional campaign associated with the privatisation of British Gas.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) on 5 November at column 471.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Peter Walker: Figures for expenditure on newspapers and TV advertising for 1979-80 to 1983-84 were given in the answer at col. 267 on 8 May 1984, and those for 1984-85 were given in the answer at col. 359 on 6 December 1985. My Department spent the following on radio advertising during this period:

1979-80 to 1982-83	Nil
1983-84	50
1984-85	27

Comparable figures for advertising for 1985-86 and the anticipated advertising expenditure for 1986-87 are:

	1985-86 £'000	1986-87 £'000
Newspapers	1,589	—
TV	2,212	4,200
Radio	—	—

The proportion of spend between TV and press in 1986-87 will be dependent upon market conditions. The figure excludes costs included in gas privatisation on which I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) on 5 November at col. 471. Other promotional literature costs can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The main advertising spend in 1985-86 and 1986-87 is to support the energy efficiency campaign.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Peter Walker: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The total number of permanent information service staff employed in my Department on 1 April in each of the years since 1979 was:

	Staff in Post[1]
1979	23
1980	25
1981	22
1982	19
1983	19
1984	18
1985	19
1986	21

[1] Excludes casual and supernumary staff, consultants and unfilled vacancies.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The total cost of consultancies is as follows:

1984-85	329
1985-86	121
1986-87	256

[1] Forecast outturn.

Expenditure in earlier years could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Civil Nuclear Programme

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy on what grounds those documents relating to the foundation of the United Kingdom civil nuclear programme, withheld from public inspection beyond a period of 30 years, would be contrary to the national interest if made available.

Mr. Goodlad: The documents contain sensitive information the disclosure of which would be contrary to the national interest.

Nuclear Reactor (Safety)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will detail what specific organisational and technical appraisals have been made of the methodology of determining the risks of an accident at a nuclear installation in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy what studies have been commissioned by his Department to assess the relevance of safety problems with the graphic moderated plutonium production reactors of Calder Hall and Chapel Cross, in the light of the discovery of safety problems with the United States Department of Energy nuclear reactor at Hanford.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 6 November 1986 at column 546.

Electricity Imports

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much electricity is likely to be imported in the period 1990 to 2000; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Purchases of electricity via the cross channel electricity link are a commercial matter for the CEGB and will depend on circumstances at the time.

Coal-fired Power Stations

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration is being given to the development of new coal-fired power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the CEGB is considering the possibility of building new coal-fired stations, but my right hon. Friend has received no application to construct new power stations apart from that for Sizewell B.

"Combating Cold Homes"

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to reply to the letter of 18 July from the right hon. Member for Brent, East enclosing a copy of a paper entitled "Combating Cold Homes."

Mr. Peter Walker: I replied to the right hon. Member on 6 August, saying that a joint reply on behalf of the three Departments to which the right hon. Member wrote was being prepared. This has now been sent by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Support Grant

13. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce the final rate support grant settlement for England for 1987-88; and whether he will give an assurance that there will be three full months between his announcement and the date by which councils have to set a rate.

Mr. Ridley: In the light of the many representations made in response to my proposals for next year's RSG settlement, I hope to announce decisions in December, rather later than I had originally planned.

23. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the proposals for rate support grant in 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: I have received representations from the local authority associations and comments from over 200 local authorities on my proposals for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement. In addition, my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and I have seen deputations from a number of authorities and hon. Members, including my hon. Friend.

25. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much rate support grant per capita was paid to Hertfordshire county council in 1985-86; and how that compares with the average for shire counties.

Mr. Chope: Hertfordshire's rate support grant for 1985-86 amounted to some £59·70 per head, at the second supplementary report for 1985-86. This compared with an average for the shire counties of £129·70.

47. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the rate support grant for 1986-87.

Dr. Boyson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment hopes to announce his decisions on the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 in December.

50. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what objections he has received in respect of his proposals for rate support grant in 1987-88; and how he intends to respond.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has received a very wide range of representations and will consider all these very carefully before he takes final decisions.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

14. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the working of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: The 1981 Act is a very wide-ranging measure and I receive a variety of representations about different aspects of it.

Urban Development Corporations

15. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress to date of urban development corporations.

Mr. Ridley: Following the success of the existing development corporations in London Docklands and on Merseyside, I intend to seek Parliament's approval to the setting up of four further corporations. I hope to lay the orders for the Trafford Park corporation before the end of the year.

"Paying for Local Government"

16. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be able to bring forward legislative proposals on local government finance following the closing of the consultation period on the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government".

Dr. Boyson: My right hon. Friend will bring forward legislative proposals as a matter of priority in the first Session of the next Parliament.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish a summary of the responses to his Green Paper "Paying for Local Government"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend will publish a summary of responses shortly.

Tenants

17. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for giving tenants greater control over their lives.

Mr. John Patten: The Housing and Planning Act 1986 gives public sector tenants a greater say in the future management and ownership of their housing and, by extending the right to buy, enables more tenants to obtain the autonomy of home ownership. In response to the Nugee report we will be introducing legislation to increase the rights of tenants in the private sector.

Irish Sea (Radioactivity)

18. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received from local authorities concerning the levels of radioactivity in the Irish sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since the beginning of this year, my Department has received letters from three local authorities, which have included references to the discharge of radioactive material into the Irish sea.

Bradford (Housing)

19. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to increase resources available to Bradford for housing purposes.

Mr. Tracey: We are at present considering a number of applications from Bradford city council for additional allocations for this year for schemes drawn up in conjunction with the Department's urban housing renewal unit. The main housing investment programme allocations for 1987-88 will be issued before Christmas.

London Marathon

20. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the arrangements for the London marathon in 1987 and subsequent years.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Minister responsible for sport has had a number of contacts with the race director. He has received 46 letters and has answered three parliamentary questions on the subject.

Local Authority Land Holdings

21. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement regarding progress by local authorities in releasing non-essential land holdings.

Mr. John Patten: I shall be bringing forward legislative proposals to improve the land registers system and to streamline the statutory procedures for forced disposals. Since 1981 43,000 acres have been removed from the registers largely because that land has been sold or brought into use. 100,000 acres, about 60 per cent. of which is owned by local authorities, remain on the registers. Progress is being made but a great deal of land owned by local authorities needs to be sold or brought into use.

Black Country (Urban Development Corporation)

22. Mr. Stokes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to appoint consultants to report on a new urban development corporation for the Black Country.

Mr. John Patten: In December, when tenders have been received and evaluated. Meanwhile, I have released a map showing the area to be studied.

London Residuary Body

24. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the London residuary body; and what matters were discussed.

Dr. Boyson: My right hon. Friend last met Sir Godfrey Taylor on 13 November to discuss matters relevant to the LRB's functions under the Local Government Act 1985.

Private Rented Accommodation

26. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the shortage of private rented accommodation.

Mr. Tracey: We continue to receive numerous representations on the shortage of such accommodation. The Rent Act is a major contributory factor to this shortage.

Local Authority Business (Inquiry)

27. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects Her Majesty's Government will publish their response to the inquiry into the conduct of local authority business.

Dr. Boyson: As my right hon. Friend made clear when the report of the inquiry—the Widdicombe report—was published on 19 June, the Government intend to weigh the public response to the report before drawing their own conclusions. Consultation on the report is still continuing: interested parties have until the end of the year to submit their views.

Housing Expenditure

28. Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much expenditure is set to increase in the coming financial year 1987-88 on (a) private housing and (b) council housing.

Mr. Tracey: Gross provision for capital expenditure by English local authorities on housing in 1987-88 has been increased to £2,922 million. This is an increase of £390 million over the original provision for 1986-87, and £231 million over the estimated outturn for that year. It is for local authorities to decide how much of these resources to devote to direct provision of housing and to assistance to private housing. However, we look to them to give first priority to the renovation and maintenance of their own stock.

Homelessness (London)

29. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the extent of homelessness in London.

Mr. John Patten: The level of homelessness in London must be a cause for concern to everyone. I was therefore very disappointed by the poor response of London boroughs to our offer of UHRU resources for schemes directed at making empty properties on estate properties available for housing homeless people.

Radiological Protection

30. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has instituted any changes in his Department's discharge of its functions for radiological protection following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Waldegrave: Together with the other Government Departments involved, my Department is currently involved in a review of existing arrangements for radiological protection, with a view to identifying changes which may be appropriate in the light of experience during the Chernobyl incident.

Property Services Agency (Glasgow)

31. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the proposed transfer of the functions of the Property Services Agency's Glasgow area office to Edinburgh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I have received a number of letters from hon. and right hon. Members and others and have met hon. Members to hear their views. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has also received a submission from the trade unions and met them on 2 October. These representations are receiving careful consideration.

Severn Barrage

32. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent his Department will be monitoring and publicising researches into the environmental implications of the proposed Severn barrage as they proceed.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department will be co-operating with the Department of Energy throughout the programme of studies which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy announced to the House on 9 July. The publication of the studies is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Planning Appeals

33. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the percentage of planning appeals allowed in the areas covered by the New Forest and Test Valley district councils; and how this compares with the national percentage.

Mr. Waldegrave: No information about the numbers of appeal decisions for individual planning authorities is available for years prior to 1984.

Information in respect of England, the Test Valley borough council and the New Forest district council for the years 1984 and 1985 and the period January to September 1986 respectively is as follows:

Planning Appeals allowed expressed as a percentage of those decided

Year	England	Test Valley	New Forest
	per cent.	per cent.	per cent.
1984	32	35 (19 appeals allowed)	26 (23 appeals allowed)
1985	37	42 (23 appeals allowed)	38 (50 appeals allowed)
1986	40	36 (16 appeals allowed)	45 (33 appeals allowed)

Fast Service Restaurants

34. Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to include fast service restaurants within class one (retail) of the Use Classes Order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's proposals for a modernised Use Classes Order were published for comment in June. We proposed that fast service restaurants, which are currently not in any use class, should be included in a new "prepared food" class. We are considering carefully the representations which we have received in response to our consultation paper.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of current environmental pollution controls operated by the fast food restaurant industry.

Mr. Waldegrave: Fast food restaurants fall within the noise nuisance provisions of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and the statutory nuisance provisions of the Public Health Act 1936. A review of these provisions has recently been conducted by my Department, and whilst there seems to be general satisfaction with the range of existing powers, some possibilities for improvements are now under consideration.

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the range of measures available to local authorities to impose controls on environmental nuisance from the fast service restaurant industry.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities are able to control nuisance from fast food establishments at several stages. Conditions may be attached to planning permission to ensure against future problems from smells, noise and litter. Existing establishments may be controlled under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 for noise nuisance, and for statutory nuisance under the Public Health Act 1936.

Grant-related Expenditure System

35. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to reappraise the grant-related expenditure system applicable to local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Secretary of State considers options for changing grant-related expenditure assessments each year, in consultation with the local authority associations. His proposals for changes to the GRE system for 1987-88 were published in the consultation paper issued on 3 October, a copy of which is in the Library.

For the future, the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd 9714) proposes a complete review of the system of local government needs assessment, with a view to making it less complex and more stable.

Council House Sales

36. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold in England since May 1979.

Mr. Tracey: From April 1979 to June 1986 about 771,000 dwellings were sold by local authorities and new towns in England.

Inner Area Programme Funding

37. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how often his Department monitors the progress and effectiveness of the inner area programme funding; and when Leicester was evaluated.

Mr. Tracey: Under the urban programme management initiative introduced last year, local authorities have to provide the department with annual reports on the achievements of their inner area programmes, including quantitative and qualitative outputs as well as outturn expenditure. Expenditure projections are provided after six and nine months of the financial year. There is a sample monitoring exercise each year in which departmental officials examine selected projects in each partnership and programme authority. Projects in Leicester were last visited under these arrangements in December 1985. Leicester's first annual report under the UPM (on 1985-86) is expected shortly.

Urban Housing Renewal Unit

38. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any proposals for expanding the work of the urban housing renewal unit.

49. Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing renewal schemes his Department's urban housing renewal unit has developed over the last year.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone).

Housing Investment Programmes

39. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total for housing investment programmes for 1987-88 net of capital receipts.

Mr. Tracey: The success of the right to buy has produced high levels of receipts from the sale of council houses. Local authorities will therefore be able to achieve the higher level of gross capital spending planned for 1987-88 with borrowing approvals of £1,366 million.

40. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding housing investment programme allocations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The regional offices of the Department have received housing investment programme submissions from all local housing authorities in England, and have now almost completed their programme of meetings with the authorities to discuss the submissions. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs, and Construction has made proposals to the local authority associations about the distribution of the allocation total, which were discussed in the Housing Consultative Council last week. All the views expressed and any further representations that may be received, will be taken into account before decisions are made on allocations to individual authorities for 1987-88.

Arlington Securities (Planning Appeal)

41. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what considerations led him to allow the appeal by Arlington Securities against the refusal of planning permission by the London borough of Bromley in respect of the proposed office development at Bromley South; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The considerations which led the Secretary of State for the Environment to allow this appeal by Arlington Securities are set out in the letter dated 25 September 1986 issued by the Department. My hon. Friend may be aware that the London borough of Bromley is seeking judicial review of that decision in the High Court and I am sure he will understand that in these circumstances it would not be appropriate for the Secretary of State to make a statement.

District Councils (Questionnaires)

42. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number and nature of questionnaires sent out by district councils over the last year.

Mr. Chope: My Department does not collect such information, but I am aware from representations received that there is a growing practice among some local authorities to issue lengthy questionnaires to potential contractors on matters unrelated to the work for which they wish to tender. We plan to bring forward proposals to deal with this practice.

Housing Association Schemes

43. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what encouragement his Department is giving to housing association schemes financed by the private sector.

Mr. John Patten: Next year the Housing Corporation's development programme will include an additional £20 million for use in schemes where housing association grant is combined with private sector loans. This will produce some £70 million of housing for rent—a 10 per cent. increase in the programme. Low cost home ownership schemes already benefit significantly from private finance. Provision in the Housing and Planning Act will open the way to more shared ownership wholly financed by the private sector. The Housing Corporation will be working closely with housing associations to take the fullest advantage of these new initiatives to meet housing need.

PRC Houses

44. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about progress made in the restoration and replacement of PRC houses.

Mr. Tracey: The National House Building Council's subsidiary company, PRC Homes Ltd., has now approved 21 repair systems for seven PRC house types (Airey, Cornish Unit, Orlit, Parkinson, Unity, Wates, Woolaway) covering over two thirds of all designated houses. Over 30 more proposed systems are currently in the pipeline. As a result, reinstatement work under the housing defects legislation is now getting under way in many areas. It is for local authorities to decide what renovation work may be needed to PRC houses in their own stock.

Inner City Areas (Planning Zones)

45. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to encourage the creation by local authorities of simplified planning zones in inner city areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: We propose to issue shortly a draft circular and memorandum to help local planning authorities in preparing simplified planning zone schemes. I shall send my hon. Friend a copy of the draft.

Green Belt

46. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to enable him to designate certain green belt land as inviolable areas in respect of which he would not be prepared to entertain planning applications or appeals in relation thereto.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is a general presumption against inappropriate development throughout the green belts, as set out in circular 14/84. My speech to the Confederation of British Industries on 14 October underlined the importance of the policy. In view of the terms of the policy I do not consider that a power on the lines proposed by my hon. Friend is necessary.

58. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about his policies to protect established green belt land in the context of initiatives to redevelop derelict and underused urban land.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's policies on the protection of green belts are set out in the Department's circular 14/84. These policies are themselves an important pressure securing the use of vacant or derelict urban land. We are continuing our efforts to get the unused and underused land in the ownership of public bodies brought back into use. So far, of the total area of such land entered on the land registers, 43,000 acres have been deleted most because it has been sold, or brought into use by the owners.

Disabled People (Coventry)

48. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many specially built dwellings for disabled people, in the public and private sector, there are in Coventry.

Mr. Tracey: The housing investment programme return from Coventry, a copy of which is available in the Library, indicated that there were 139 public sector dwellings purpose-built or adapted for use by disabled people as at 1 April 1986. Further returns indicated an additional 100 dwellings purpose-built for disabled people.

Rate Support Grant (Surrey)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received following his rate support grant proposals for the county of Surrey.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has received letters from many hon. Members representing constituents in the county of Surrey as well as from the county council itself. My hon. Friend, the Minister for Local Government, also met representatives of Surrey county council on 13 November.

Community Charge

52. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations from local authorities he has received in favour of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Chope: We are currently analysing the many responses to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government". My right hon. Friend will publish a summary of the representations received in due course.

Derelict Land

53. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to facilitate development of derelict land.

Mr. Tracey: Resources for derelict land grant in England have increased from £23 million in 1979 to £83·4 million in 1986-87 and priority is now given to the reclamation of urban sites intended for private sector industrial, commercial or housing development. These account for over 60 per cent. of land reclaimed. My right hon. Friend has recently announced proposals for four further urban development corporations which will also make a substantial contribution to encourage development of derelict sites.

River Pollution

54. Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current level of pollution of British rivers.

Mr. Waldegrave: I expect the results of the 1985 river quality survey for England and Wales to be published before the end of the year. I understand that my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland intends to publish the results of a similar survey for Scotland shortly afterwards.

Historic Buildings

55. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what encouragement his Department is providing for the restoration of historic buildings.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department encourages the private and voluntary sectors to co-operate in the repair and restoration of historic buildings and ancient monuments. It continues to provide substantial resources for this purpose through the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England. This year around £30 million will be spent on this work, of which £20 million will be in the form of grants to private owners. In 1987-88 my Department is giving the commission an additional £1·5 million to spend on grant-related work.

The Property Services Agency, which forms part of my Department, continues to maintain to a high standard those historic buildings which form part of the Government estate and this year are spending over £80 million on conservation-related work.

Countryside (Access)

56. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Countryside Commission to discuss measures to improve public access to the countryside.

Mr. Waldegrave: Although my right hon. Friend met Sir Derek Barber on 22 October, the last occasion on which access to the countryside was discussed with the chairman of the Countryside Commission was at my meeting with him in June about the commission's corporate strategy.

Privatisation

57. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have put one or more services out to competitive tender; and if he will estimate the savings made.

Dr. Boyson: The Department does not collect data of this kind. However, figures produced by the public and local service efficiency campaign (PULSE) show that 141 different councils have contracted out at least one service, at a current annual saving of £22,390,000.

Ancient Monuments

59. Mr. Andrew Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will revise the level of public funds directed towards the maintenance of ancient monuments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Under the normal public expenditure planning cycle, all expenditure programmes are reviewed annually. This includes discussion about the expenditure incurred by the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission specifically on the maintenance and upkeep of ancient monuments. In general I am satisfied that the commission is devoting an adequate proportion of its resources to this task.

Housing (Leicester)

60. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing starts there have been in the city of Leicester in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector, in the years 1979 and 1985; and how many are expected for 1986.

Mr. Tracey: The number of housebuilding starts reported by Leicester in 1979, 1985 and the first half of 1986 appears in issues 59, 78 and 79, respectively, of "Local Housing Statistics"; copies are available in the Library. It is not the practice to make forecasts.

Local Authority Services

61. Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to promote competition in the provision of local authorities' services.

Dr. Boyson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean) earlier today.

Home Improvements

62. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to stimulate home improvements in the private sector.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend announced last week that the planned increase in current spending on housing for 1987-88 contained provision for a new initiative to encourage the growth of home improvement agency schemes which provide practical help and advice to home owners in getting repair and improvement work done to their property.

On 17 November I announced that the Government have agreed to provide just over £2 million to the private sector to help the National Home Improvement Council's neighbourhood revitalisation services establish a further 25 schemes to build on the success of the four pilot projects it has already established. The first of the new NRS projects are expected to be in Rochdale, Tameside, Bradford and High Peak.

A further 25 new projects are to be established in the voluntary sector by Care and Repair Ltd., with Government support of almost £1 million. Five of these schemes will be set up independently by Anchor Housing Trust, and the remainder by other housing associations and voluntary organistions. Care and Repair and Anchor has pioneered the provision of "staying put" services for the elderly, and have established around 20 schemes between them so far. The first projects under the new initiative are expected to be in Bristol, Newham, Leicester and Wigan.

The Government's contribution will be matched pound for pound by the private and voluntary sectors, making £6 million available towards the start-up costs of 50 new projects nationwide. Agency services have already shown that they have a significant role to play in tackling disrepair in the housing stock, by directing help to those who heed it most and in attracting private investment to supplement grant spending. I am glad that the Government have been able to support this significant expansion.

Rate Support Grant (Essex)

63. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to meet the chairman of Essex county council to discuss rate support grants.

Mr. Chope: The Minister for Local Government met the chairman of Essex county council and other Essex councillors and officers on November 4 to discuss our proposals for next year's rate support grant settlement.

Housebuilding Statistics

64. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of homes he expects to be built in 1987; and how this will compare with the number built in 1985 and 1975.

Mr. Tracey: The numbers of house building completions in 1975 and 1985 appear in table 6.1 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1975-1985", which is available in the Library. It is not the practice to make forecasts.

Town and Country Planning

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has yet considered the Property Advisory Group's recommendations concerning modernisation of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: On the 16 June we published the Government's proposals for a modernised Use Classes Order, in the light of responses to the Property Advisory Group's report. We are currently considering carefully the representations which we have received in response to our consultation document.

Sewers

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the standard of construction of sewers on new building estates; whether he will introduce legislation to make mandatory section 18 of the Public Health Act 1936 in this respect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Government are aware of difficulties over the standard of construction of new sewers and their adoption into the public sewerage system. Improvements were proposed in the consultation paper "Water and Sewerage Law" published in March, a copy of which is deposited in the Library. Decisions on implementation of the proposals have yet to be taken.

District Councils (Oxfordshire)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the estimated effect on the 1987-88 rate support grant allocation to each district council in Oxfordshire if the proposed safety rate for 1987-88 were not introduced.

Mr. Chope: On the basis of the provisional figures set out in the second consultation paper on the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement, the block grant entitlements of district councils in Oxfordshire for spending at the settlement assumption would vary by the following amounts if the safety net multiplier were not applied:

Cherwell	+119,000
Oxford	−4,000
South Oxfordshire	+129,000
Vale of White Horse	+125,000

Shire Counties (Expenditure)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total rate and grant-borne expenditure on average per head of population for each of the English shire counties for 1986-87.

Mr. Chope: The information is as follows:

Pollution Act 1974

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will summarise the results of his Department's review of the operation of the control of Pollution Act 1974 as it effects noise nuisance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The outcome of the review of local authority practice and court decisions on statutory nuisance (both emissions and noise) was announced in the White Paper "Building and Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794).

Both local authorities and bodies representing industry, who were consulted during the review, expressed general satisfaction with the powers of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 as they related to noise. The Government do not therefore see any need at present for changes in this legislation.

Beaches (Cleanliness)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to bring all United Kingdom beaches up to the cleanliness standards set down by the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Many of our bathing waters already meet the standards set by the directive (76/160/EEC). New sea outfalls are generally designed to ensure that receiving waters meet the directive's standards and some £70 million is now being spent annually on schemes to improve coastal water quality. As a result, we expect a steady increase in the number of waters meeting the directive's standards.

Urban Programme

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what prior consultations he had with the 23 local authorities which he has decided to deny access to urban programme funds in 1987; what response he has had on this decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Comments were invited on 7 August from local authority associations and others about our proposals to concentrate urban programme resources on the areas of greatest need. We are carefully considering the responses received so far and I am meeting representatives of the authorities affected on 9 December.

Urban Renewal

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect the lack of fully trained environmental health officers is having on the Government's urban renewal programmes.

Mr. Tracey: None.

Rent Act 1977

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans his Department have to encourage the use of section 68 of the Rent Act 1977 by local authorities.

Mr. Tracey: None. The use of section 68 is a matter for the discretion of the local authorities.

Departmental Inspectors

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total number of inspectors employed by his Department to hear planning appeals for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Tracey: The full-time housing and planning inspectors in England in post on 1 April for the last 10 years were:

	Number
1977	199
1978	197
1979	198
1980	190
1981	191
1982	191
1983	177
1984	169
1985	171
1986	183

About 60 per cent. of the work-load of salaried inspectors is on work other than planning appeals made under section 36 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. Part-time fee-paid inspectors currently undertake roughly half of the appeals made by written representations; their contribution is equal to the work load of a further 28 full-time inspectors.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of inspectors employed by his Department who have previously been employed by builders or developers.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not readily available from our records.

House Improvement Schemes

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about home improvement schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) earlier today.

Rents

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the annual rate of inflation for registered fair rents and for assured tenancies (a) nationally and (b) in London and the south-east region for 1985-86; what was the rate for April to October 1986; and what is the expected rate for 1986-87.

Mr. Tracey: Estimated mean annual percentage changes in fair rents on comparable re-registrations in 1985 and first half 1986 are as follows:

Annualised percentage rate of change for comparable re-registrations[1] by rent officers period of re-registration

	1985		First half 1986
	Regulated unfurnished	Housing associations	Regulated unfurnished	Housing associations
England and Wales	8	7	8	7
London	8	8	5	8
Rest of South East	9	7	9	7

[1] Where there has been no material change in the terms of the tenancy or in the dwelling's conditions since previous registration took place no more than 2·75 years earlier.

Information about assured tenancy rents was collected for the first time in 1986, and is published in the Department's latest monitoring report on the assured tenancy scheme. Copies of the report are in the Library.

House Prices

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the annual rate of inflation for housing prices (a) nationally and (b) in London and the south-east region for 1985-86; what is the rate for April to October 1986; and what is the expected rate for 1986-87.

Mr. Tracey: Following are the available estimates:

House price increases

	1984-85 to 1985-86	1st half 1985 to 1st half 1986
	Per cent.	Per cent.
United Kingdom	9	13
London	15	21
Rest of South East	11	14

The sample of mortgages is too small to provide reliable quarterly regional indices, but nationally prices rose by 13 per cent. between the second quarters of 1985 and 1986.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Ridley: Expenditure by my Department on fees to management and computer consultants from 1984-85 is as follows:

	DOE (Central)	PSA
Outturn 1984-85	793	677
Outturn 1985-86 £k	1,458	1,566
Forecast outturn 1986-87	2,799	4,044

The DOE(C) figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 do not include the cost of computer consultants since the information is not readily identifiable in those years. For 1986-87 forecast expenditure on computer consultants accounts for £191k of the total.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(2) how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the estimated spending by his Department on televison, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Ridley: The information relating to television and press advertising in the years 1979-80 to 1983-84 was contained in the answer given by the then Secretary of State for the Environment to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 8 May 1984 at column 325.

For subsequent years the expenditure was as follows:

	1984-85	1985-86
	£	£
Newspapers	679,690	543,527
Television	516,381	Nil

Figures for radio and other promotional literature are as follows:

	Radio	Other promotional literature
	£	£
1979-80	19,455	[1]45,500
1980-81	Nil	388,301
1981-82	11,500	387,200
1982-83	Nil	516,795
1983-84	Nil	383,309
1984-85	4,832	1,100,918
1985-86	38,946	599,316

[1] Does not include HMSO costs.

The estimated expenditure in 1986-87 on advertising in all media (a breakdown is not possible at this stage) is £602,500, and for other promotional literature £1,022,500.

Environment Health Officers

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the number of vacancies for environmental health officers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chope: No. The recruitment of environmental health officers is a local authority responsibility.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans his Department has to encourage people to train as environmental health officers.

Mr. Chope: None.

Smith Houses

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for the repair of Smith houses; and if, in view of the unforeseen costs of the repairs proposed, he will consider a substantial increase of the basic £20,000 allocated for each house.

Mr. Tracey: Under the housing defects legislation it is for the local authority, rather than the Secretary of State to specify the reinstatement works needed in any particular case. However, I understand that PRC Homes Ltd, the subsidiary company set up by the National House Building Council to appraise repair methods, is at present examining a system for reinstating Smith houses, and that it expects to receive details of a further system shortly. We have no reason to believe that the recently revised expenditure limit of £20,000 for Smith houses will prove inadequate.

Water Supplies

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the percentage of the population who receive public water supplies from rivers which have been exempted from the 50mg limit on nitrate pollution or in respect of which a notification of levels in excess of 50mg has been made to medical officers during the most recent 12 months for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: About 0·5 per cent. of the population receive public water supplies which are wholly or partly derived from river sources and which have been given a derogation to exceed the figure of 50mg of nitrate per litre set in the EC directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption. I do not have information about the population for whom notifications of levels in excess of 50mg per litre have been made to medical officers.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sea Defences

66. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about sea defences; what resources have been allocated for the next three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Representations were received earlier this year from the Anglian Water Authority, district and county councils along the east coast of England, The National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association and from a number of individuals about the financing of sea defence work. Government funds available for flood defence work for next three years 1987-88 to 1989-90 total £20·2 million, £20·6 million and £18·1 million respectively, of which over half are expected to be allocated to sea defence schemes. The importance attached by the Government to sea defence works is illustrated by the increase aid of £16·75 million which I announced in August for the period to the end of 1989-90, which will be largely devoted to works along the east coast and at Seaford in Essex.

Dairy Inspections

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will explain in detail how the proposed charge of £90 is arrived at for a single visit by a dairy inspector; and what representations he has received from the Milk Marketing Board on this matter.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(2) what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year;

(3) how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Council of Agriculture Meetings

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers on 17 and 18 November.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham).

Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting held in Brussels on 17 to 18 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting, which was chaired by my right hon. Friend the Minister.

The main items before the Council were the Commission's proposals for major changes in the support arrangements for milk and beef, intended to address the serious surplus situation in these sectors.

So far as milk is concerned, the Commission had in September proposed various measures, mainly to reduce the support provided through the intervention system, which they intended should be immediately applicable. They have recently added proposals for additional cuts in production quotas, over and above the cuts agreed in the 1986 price-fixing negotiations, to apply from 1 April 1987 and 1 April 1988; and also certain proposals to make the quotas apply more strictly. For beef, the proposals were those made by the Commission in the context of the last price negotiations, together with certain recent amendments to them.

I strongly supported the need for urgent action in both sectors. However, after lengthy and detailed negotiations, there remained considerable differences of view between the member States, on both the nature and degree of the action that needed to be taken. My right hon. Friend was reluctantly obliged to conclude that there was no basis for reaching immediate agreement. He underlined the serious situation confronting the Community in both sectors and strongly urged the Council to be ready to take final decisions at its next meeting in December.

After I had again raised the question of a devaluation of the green pound, the Commission came forward with a proposal during the meeting to devalue both the green pound and the green franc for beef and sheepmeat. For the green pound the proposal was for a reduction in the monetary gap of six points for beef and two points for sheepmeat. I noted that this met our request in these two sectors. The Council was not disposed to approve the proposal immediately, and it has been remitted for technical examination.

The French Minister again drew attention to the situation in the sheepmeat market in France. He considered that this was due to increased exports from the United Kingdom to France, as a result of the fall in the value of the pound, and he wanted the immediate introduction of some form of monetary corrective on trade in sheepmeat which would increase the charge already levied on our exports.

I successfully resisted any such charge and drew attention to the unacceptable interferance in our trade by lawless acts in France. The Commission indicated that they would make a proposal to enable the payment of annual ewe premium to producers to be varied seasonally and that they would under their own powers make provision for the advance payment of 75 per cent. of the annual premium to producers in less-favoured areas. Though requested by France, this provision will be of general application throughout the Community. The Commission also recalled that they intend to report on the agrimonetary system as a whole by the end of the year.

The Council resumed negotiations on the proposals for changes in the structural policy. I argued strongly that these needed to be examined to ensure that they would not run counter to the policies for tackling surpluses. In particular, I welcomed the proposal on environmentally sensitive areas. The Council will return to this in December.

Among several measures adopted by the Council at this session were two regulations concerning the protection of forests from fire and from atmospheric pollution. These regulations are intended to establish a degree of Community-wide co-operation in this sector.

Agriculture Act 1985

Mr. Evans asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implementation and consequences to date of the Agriculture Act 1985.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Road Accidents

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number of motorway accidents which have occurred on the stretch of the A1 between Wetherby and Dishforth during the last 10 years; and whether there are patterns of accidents on any particular stretches of this road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested about the number of accidents is as follows:

Number of personal injury accidents

1977	6	24	34	64
1978	4	22	23	49
1979	5	16	22	43
1980	2	20	24	46
1981	5	25	19	49
1982	2	21	35	58
1983	0	21	18	39
1984	2	19	23	44
1985	0	27	35	62
1986[1]	6	15	26	47
Totals	32	210	259	501

[1] January-October inclusive.

Our information indicates no pattern of accidents on particular stretches of the A1 between Wetherby and Dishforth.

BR (Recruitment and Employment Policies)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will call for a report from the chairman of British Rail about what progress it is making to rectify the charges of inequality contained in the 1985 Equal Opportunities Commission's report on British Rail's recruitment and employment policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. Recruitment and employment policies are matters for the British Railways Board to decide within the framework of the law. I welcome the action that the board has take since receiving the Commission's report, including the restatement of its equal opportunities policy in a "Working Guide", a copy of which I am placing in the Library.

Piccadilly Contract

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many months the contractor Murphy has been working on the Piccadilly contract; and how many more months are anticipated before the work is completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: These are matters for Westminster city council.

Uranium Hexafluoride (Transportation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether passenger ferries still transport uranium hexafluoride between France and Newhaven; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Consignments of UF6 imported into the United Kingdom via Newhaven are destined for BNFL's Springfields Works, Lancashire. All movements of UF6 are carried out in accordance with national and international regulations which permit the use of either cargo or passenger ferries.

M4 (Lighting)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will consider lighting the M4 motorway from London to the Severn bridge; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider implementing lighting the M4 motorway in stages for a period of up to five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Lighting may only be provided on those sections where it can be economically and environmentally justified in accordance with the policy that I announced on 24 July. Currently there are no plans to light further sections but the situation is kept continuously under review.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Transport what would be the cost of lighting the M4 from Reading to the Severn bridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cost of lighting all remaining unlit sections of the M4 from Junction 8/9 east of Reading to the Severn bridge would be approximately £10·5 million at 1986 prices.

Russian Trawlers

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he intends to take in order to safeguard British harbours from Russian trawlers entering without proper authorisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Anglo-Soviet shipping relations are conducted within the framework of the 1968 Anglo-Soviet treaty on merchant navigation. This provides that the non-military vessels of the two countries shall have access to those ports which are open to other foreign vessels.

Midland Fox Bus Co.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will report on the recent visit to Midland Fox bus headquarters, Leicester by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. David Mitchell: I took advantage of a visit to the East Midlands on 29 October to call on the Midland Fox bus company in Leicester. I discussed with the management their experience of the first days of bus deregulation, the introduction of Foxcub minibuses, which has resulted in a substantial increase in patronage; and the development of competition with local bus operators, including other subsidiaries of the National Bus Company. I also visited the company's minibus depot and saw Leicester's modern bus station. I was most encouraged by what I saw and heard, which shows that after an initial hiatus the deregulation is likely to produce better services for bus passengers in many parts of the country.

A38 (Improvements)

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he hopes to have the results of the investigations currently being undertaken about improvements to the A38 between Saltash and Bodmin; when he intends to announce his preferred route; and if, in view of recent serious accidents on the Saltash-Trerulefoot section, he will bring forward the proposed construction date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received the report of the consultants appointed to identify viable improvements of the A38 between Saltash and Bodmin and are considering whether any should be added to the national trunk road programme. A preferred route for the A38 between Saltash and Trerulefoot was announced in 1978.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Michael Tighe

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list each occasion when Sir John Hermon, Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and his deputy, Mr. Michael McAtamney, have been officially asked to make available the tape recording of the death of Michael Tighe in Northern Ireland in 1982; what was their response to each request; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will explain the role of section E4A in respect of the operation which resulted in the death of Michael Tighe in Northern Ireland in 1982; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether he has asked for a report about the apparent destruction of the tape recording made at the time of the death of Michael Tighe in a shed in Northern Ireland in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) on 23 October.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list all officers responsible for the operations and activities of the Royal Ulster Constabulary southern region headquarters mobile support unit in 1982; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will explain the functions of the Royal Ulster Constabulary southern region headquarters mobile support unit (a) in 1982 and (b) currently; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: It is not the practice to publish information on operational matters such as these.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Dr. Mawhinney: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of staff in information officer grades employed in the information service was as follows:

Year at 1 April	Northern Ireland Office (London)	Northern Ireland Office (Belfast) and Northern Ireland Departments
1979	5	16
1980	5	16
1981	5	15
1982	5	15
1983	4	15
1984	4	15
1985	4	15
1986	4	15

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make an assessment of the impact of Anglo-Irish Agreement on attitudes in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 59]: The agreement continues to be generally welcomed by nationalists although opposition to it within the unionist community remains strong. Such opposition is misguided since the agreement offers substantial benefits to both sides of the community without in any way detracting from the rights or interest of either. The Government will, therefore, continue to implement the agreement in the interests of all the people in Northern Ireland.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 20 November 1986

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Issue Office

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Lord Privy Seal when he expects the Norman Shaw North Issue Office to extend its opening hours beyond 6 pm; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: With effect from 1 December the Norman Shaw North Issue Office will remain open until 10 pm on sitting Mondays to Thursdays. In accordance with the recommendation of the Services Committee, this extension in opening hours will apply for an experimental period of six months.

ENVIRONMENT

Fast Food

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he as made of the impact of easing the planning regulations for the fast service restaurant industry on the number of new jobs which could be created; and if he will make a statment.

Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implication of further planning restrictions on the fast service restaurant industry for the potential for new jobs in that industry throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effect of the Government's proposals to modernise the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972 on the fast service restaurant business; and if he will make a statement.

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications of the Property Advisory Group's recommendations on modernising the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972 for the creation of new jobs in the fast service restaurant business.

Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications of the Property Advisory Group's recommendations on modernising the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972 for employment in the fast service restaurant business.

Mr. Tracey: Following an earlier report by the Property Advisory Group which was published for comment, the Government's proposals for a modernised Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) order were put out for consultation in June. The effects on business activity and therefore employment were taken into account in shaping those proposals. We proposed that fast service restaurants, which are currently not in any use clase, should be included in a new "prepared food" class. The effect of this would be to widen the range of buildings which could be taken over for use as fast service restaurants without the need for planning permission. We are considering carefully the representations which we have received in response to our consultation paper.

North Sea (Pollution)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he has to ascertain the scale of pollution in the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The condition of the North sea is kept under regular surveillance by the Oslo and Paris commissions, of which the United Kingdom is an active member. Scientists from the relevant Government Departments responsible for monitoring United Kingdom North sea waters contribute to the assessments undertaken by the commissions. In addition, my Department is co-ordinating the scientific preparations for the forthcoming international North sea conference.

Wildlife (North Sea)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to protect wildlife in the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Wildlife on the United Kingdom coasts and in United Kingdom North sea coastal waters, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, is protected under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. This Act has strengthened the protection of birds, wild creatures and plants, and also provides for the establishment of marine nature reserves.

Thames Water

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment at what rate for 1987-88 he requires Thames water authority to repay its long-term debt; and if he will indicate the likely price rise for Thames water customers as a consequence.

Mr. John Patten: I have written to the chairman of the Thames water authority informing him that the external finance limit for his authority for 1987-88 will be minus £98 million. The precise increase in charges is a matter for the authority.

First-time Home Buyers

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the Government's assistance now available to first-time home buyers.

Mr. John Patten: The Government have given many tenants of public authorities the opportunity to become home owners for the first time. Over 1 million dwellings in Great Britain have been sold by public authorities since the Government took office. The Housing and Planning Act 1986 will improve the terms of the right to buy by allowing higher discounts (up to a maximum of 70 per cent.) and by reducing the period of liability to repay discount on resale from five to three years.

The Government have also introduced measures in the Housing and Planning Act 1986 which will encourage the expansion of shared ownership by making privately financed housing association schemes more feasible. The Government are encouraging building societies and other lending institutions to take up these funding opportunities using new forms of finance currently being developed. In this way people who might not otherwise be able to afford to buy homes will have the opportunity to do so. This could prove particularly helpful to first time purchasers in the south of England.

First-time buyers may qualify for benefits under the home loan scheme. Provided the savings conditions are fulfilled, the scheme can provide a loan of £600 free of interest for up to five years and a bonus of £110 to first-time purchasers buying a house within the regional price limits.

Mortgage interest tax relief is available on the first £30,000 of a mortgage loan; and no stamp duty is payable on homes costing £30,000 or less. The Government have also encouraged competition in the house buying system. The reduction in the cost of buying a house resulting from these measures will benefit particularly first-time buyers.

Portsdown Park Estate

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the course of the telephone call to the leader of Portsmouth city council on 4 March, it was made clear that consent for the council's scheme to refurbish the Portsdown Park estate had been refused.

Mr. John Patten: I made it clear that, on the basis of the information which had been provided, I did not think that the Secretary of State would be justified in granting consent to the disposal on the terms proposed.

Queslett Site (Birmingham)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will refuse the application for derelict land grant from Blue Circle Industries in respect of the site at Queslett in Birmingham on the grounds that it involves the disturbance and movement of tipped waste.

Mr. John Patten: I cannot take a decision on this derelict land grant application until I receive the further information on the costs of the work involved which has been requested by my Department. I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman is informed of the grant decision in due course.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date his Department received the application for derelict land grant from Blue Circle Industries in respect of the site at Queslett in Birmingham; and what is the amount of grant requested.

Mr. John Patten: The application for grant was received on 3 April 1986. The amount of grant requested was £526,000 against estimated total reclamation costs of £720,000. Subsequent discussions indicate that total costs may have been under estimated and revised figures are awaited.

Heating Charges

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to introduce heating charges regulations under section 108 of the Housing Act 1985.

Mr. John Patten: My Department issued a consultation letter on 16 June 1986 seeking the views of the local authority associations, housing associations and voluntary groups on the content to possible heating charges regulations and the timing of their introduction. We are considering the responses.

Water Supplies

Mr. Silkin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in the light of the recent discharges into the Rhine of certain toxic chemicals, he is satisfied that the water authorities have adequate contingency plans to contain or direct chemicals from their water and to provide alternative supplies in the event of a large water body being contaminated within their area.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following a pollution incident on the River Dee in 1984, my Department asked the Water Authorities Association and Water Companies Association to report upon measures needed to protect river-derived water supplies in the event of a similar incident. In the light of that report, all water authorities and water companies reviewed their emergency procedures and informed my Department of the steps they were taking to fill gaps identified. A number of recent pollution incidents have shown that adequate contingency plans do exist.

I shall, however, consider whether there are any lessons to be learnt from the recent incidents on the Rhine to see whether more needs to be done.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. St. John-Stevas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give reasons for the proposed cut in the rate support grant for Essex; and if, in the light of representations he has received from the right hon. Member for Chelmsford and other hon. Members he will cease these.

Mr. Chope: The amount of grant Essex county council receives in 1987-88 depends on the level at which it spends. If it budgets to increase expenditure in line with inflation, I estimate that it will receive about £118 million grant on the basis of my proposals; this is only £1 million less than this year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider all the representations made to him on his porposals for next year's rate support grant settlement before taking final decisions.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Courts

78. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Attorney-General what response he has received to his proposals for a system of family courts.

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend is probably referring to the consultation paper prepared by the inter-departmental committee of officials established by the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary to examine the feasibility of a unified court with exclusive jurisdiction in family matters. The Lord Chancellor's Department has received 169 responses to that paper and these are now being analysed.

Minet-PCW Syndicates

Mr. Arnold asked the Attorney-General when the Director of Public Prosecutions expects to complete his investigation into the Minet-PCW syndicates.

The Attorney-General: It is not yet possible for the Director of Public Prosecutions to say when the fraud investigation group set up to investigate the affairs of the Minet-PCW syndicates will complete its inquiries. The FIG is still awaiting the outcome of inquiries abroad. When these are completed is not within the control of the group.

National Security (Prosecutions)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General whether he will prosecute Mr. Rupert Allason, alias Mr. Nigel West, for conspiracy with others to publish information on matters relating to national security.

The Attorney-General: I have agreed with the Director of Public Prosecutions that he will ask the Metropolitan police to investigate certain statements attributed in recent press articles to Mr. Nigel West concerning matters relating to the security services.

(4) whether he will prosecute Mr. Anthony Simkins former deputy director general of MI5 for passing information to Mr. Rupert Allason alias Mr. Nigel West relating to the security services.

The Attorney-General: I have asked the Director of Public Prosecutions to consider these questions in the light of the result of the police investigation referred to in my answer to the hon. Gentleman's earlier question.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General (1) whether he proposes to take any steps against Colonel William Skarden in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

(2) whether he proposes to take any steps against Andrew King in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

(7) whether he proposes to take any steps against Nigel Burgess in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

(8) whether he proposes to take any steps against Constance Burgess in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department she has given to publishers;

(9) whether he proposes to take any steps against Russell Lee in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

(10) whether he proposes to take any steps against Christopher Haines in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

(11) whether he proposes to take any steps against William Luke in respect of information on MI5, MI6 or any other security agency or department he has given to publishers;

The Attorney-General: Former and present servants of the Crown are well aware that they may not make unauthorised disclosure of information acquired in their work. Formal letters underlining the duty of confidentiality have been sent to a number of former officials whom Mr. Penrose and Mr. Freeman purport to quote in their book "Conspiracy of Silence". I do not propose to identify the individuals concerned.

Mr. Peter Cameron Webb

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General (1) if he has any plans to take out a warrant for the arrest of Peter Cameron Webb; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he is now in a position to begin extradition proceedings against Peter Cameron Webb; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The fraud investigation group established by the Director of Public Prosecutions for the purpose of this case continues vigorously to pursue inquiries with a view to securing, in a form admissible in criminal proceedings in England, evidence to justify the institution of such proceedings and an application for extradition. Any such application would be founded upon a warrant obtained under the provisions of section 1 of the Magistrates Courts Act 1980. However, that stage has not yet been reached.

Lloyd's

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General how many cases, and in respect of how many people, have been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions by Lloyd's since 1980; in how many cases (a) warrants for arrest have been taken out, (b) extradition proceedings have been started or completed, (c) criminal charges have been laid, (d) prosecutions have been brought and (e) convictions have been secured; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Seven cases, in respect of 37 persons, have been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions by Lloyd's since 1980. Prosecutions in one of those cases, in respect of three people, are in progress. Prosecution had already taken place before referral in one case, and in that case a conviction was secured. In two cases decisions have been taken not to bring criminal proceedings. In the remaining three cases decisions have not yet been taken.

(2) what action she intends to take to secure possession of documents relating to the security services which were given to Mr. Rupert Allason alias Nigel West, currently held by solicitors in London.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers given to him today by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister whether she will set up an inquiry into identifying those persons who have given information on matters relating to the security services to Mr. Phillip Knightley for use in his book "The Second Oldest Profession" and other publications.

The Prime Minister: The matter is under consideration.

Mr. Terry Waite

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister on what dates Ministers or departmental officials have discussed matters relating to Iran with Mr. Terry Waite, the Archbishop of Canterbury's emissary, during the current year.

The Prime Minister: As the Archbishop's representative, Mr. Waite is entirely independent of Government. None the less, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office maintains contact with Mr. Waite on questions of mutual interest covering many countries. The only contact on Iran was in connection with a consular case in Iran. No record has been kept of the dates this year on which such contacts have occurred.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister what Ministers have held discussions with Mr. Terry Waite, the Archbishop of Canterbury's emissary, since 1 September; and on what dates.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what arrangements have been made for consideration by the European Council of the monthly reports on agricultural spending which were required to be submitted by the European Economic Community Commission to the Council following the Council agreements of 4 December 1984; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: There are no plans to discuss the monthly reports on agricultural spending as such at the next European Council, but they are taken fully into account by the Budget Council.

Mr. Peter Wright (Australian Court Action)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Prime Minister what has been the total cost to public funds, including fares and subsistence for civil servants detached from their normal duties, associated with the court action in Australia to prevent publication of a book by Mr. Peter Wright.

The Prime Minister: The total cost to public funds to date of the court action in Australia concerning the publication of a book by Mr. Peter Wright, including legal costs, fares and subsistence for civil servants, is estimated to be of the order of £100,000.

EMPLOYMENT

Claimant Advisers

Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General how many unemployment review officers-claimant advisers are employed in the DE group; how many work in unemployment benefit offices; how many are currently placed in jobcentres; and how many are planned to be working in jobcentres by January 1987.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 23 July, at columns 304-5, claimant advisers are being introduced into unemployment benefit offices to replace unemployment review officers operating in the Department of Health and Social Security. There will be 171 advisers in post by the end of November,, rising to 640 by the end of march 1987. All claimant advisers will be Department of Employment staff working from unemployment benefit offices. They may make local arrangements to interview in jobcentres, but we will not collect figures on the numbers making such arrangements.

Community Programme

Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the most recently available tables to show the total number of community programme projects and places by type of project and type of sponsor.

Mr. Lee: Following are the latest tables listing the total number of community programme projects and authorised places, by project and sponsor type. The information was collated on 11 September 1986.

Table 1 gives information about projects, and table 2, places.

Dr. Godman asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of persons registered on community programme placements in Greenock and Port Glasgow at the latest available date.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to give information exactly in the form requested. However, at the end of October, the latest date for which statistics are available, there were 5,333 people employed on the community programme in the Renfrewshire area. This includes the areas of Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Paymaster General what is the present number of people registered as unemployed in the London borough of Wandsworth and the number of job vacancies registered at local jobcentres.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 9 October 1986 there were 16,061 unemployed claimants in the London borough of Wandsworth. On 3 October 1986 the number of unfilled vacancies at the Balham, Clapham Junction and Tooting jobcentres, which cover an area closely correspnding to the London borough of Wandsworth, was 1,038.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General if he will list the travel-to-work areas in the United Kingdom where unemployment is above the national average, giving in each case the number of jobless now and in May 1979, and the percentage increase.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the travel-to-work areas in the United Kingdom where the unemployment percentage rate is above the United Kingdom rate of 13·1 per cent. in October 1986. It is not possible to give comparable figures with May 1979 because of the revision of travel-to-work area boundaries in 1984 and changes in the way the figures are collected. All the unemployment percentage rates show the unemployed as a percentage of employees in employment plus the unemployed.

Benefits

Dr. Godman asked the Paymaster General (1) what is the total number of persons being seen on an average day by benefit officers conducting availability testing interviews in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Scotland as a whole;

(2) what is the total number of persons whose benefit has been terminated or suspended as a result of interviews conducted on the availability test in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Scotland as a whole;

(3) if he will make it his policy to advise claimants interviewed on the availability test in Scotland to seek independent advice before completion of the questionnaire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As the revised procedures for testing availability for work are being introduced progressively between October 1986 and January 1987, it is not possible to provide this information at present. It has never been our normal practice to suggest to claimants that they seek independent advice about their entitlement to benefit and we have no plans to change this policy. In individual cases staff do, where appropriate, draw attention to the help that certain bodies can provide.

Dr. Godman asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of persons in (a) Glasgow and Port Greenock, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Scotland as a whole who have had their benefit suspended for failure to attend restart interviews at the latest available date.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No one can lose his benefit entitlements solely as a result of the restart programme. Under long-standing legal rules people can lose their entitlement to benefit if they fail to attend an interview, are not available for work, or refuse an offer of suitable employment.

As at 9 October 1986 the number of people who had benefit disallowed as a result of failure to attend restart interviews was:

	Number
Greenock and Port Glasgow	6
Strathclyde region	228
Scotland	393

Job Training Schemes

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General (1) how much the agencies which have been selected as Dundee management agents for the new Manpower Services Commission's job training schemes for the long-term unemployed will be paid by the Manpower Services Commission once the trainee has been placed with a company;

(2) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will be credited with national insurance contributions while on the scheme;

(3) which agencies in Dundee have been selected to manage the new Manpower Services Commission's job training scheme for long-term unemployed; and on what criteria the selection was made;

(4) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will be regarded as new claimants if they sign on when the scheme finishes;

(5) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee, will have their unemployment benefit withdrawn if they refuse to participate in the scheme;

(6) why his officers were unable to provide information to those 20 long-term unemployed claimants invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme in Dundee as to the implications for their entitlement to benefits of accepting a place on the scheme;

(7) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will still be registered as unemployed if they accept this job training scheme;

(8) how much the agencies which have been selected as Dundee management agents for the new Manpower Services Commission job training scheme for the long-term unemployed will be paid per person each week for administration costs, from the Manpower Services Commission;

(9) if the companies which accept trainees from the new Manpower Services Commission's job training scheme for the long-term unemployed are obliged to pay a fee for the trainee.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Toxic Chemicals

Mr. Silkin asked the Paymaster General whether, in the light of the recent discharges in the Rhine of certain toxic chemicals, he is satisfied that the arrangements for the storage of similar toxic chemicals in the United Kingdom are adequate and that there is no danger in the United Kingdom of a similar environmental disaster.

Mr. Trippier: While we should not be complacent about the risk of a major accident, I am satisfied that controls are in force in this country which will reduce so far as possible the chance of an environmental accident of this type.

The Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 provide controls which are aimed at the prevention of major accidents arising from industrial activities and the limitation of the effects of such accidents on man and the environment.

We are awaiting more precise details of the Rhine accident and the United Kingdom will of course take account of any special lessons which are to be learnt.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Lloyd's

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the report of the inquiry into the operation of Lloyd's.

Mr. Butcher: I understand that the committee of inquiry into the regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's hope to be able to submit its report to the Secretary of State in the first half of December. Arrangements will be made for its early publication.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to introduce the new CEPT frequencies.

Mr. Butcher: The Government announced on 7 May last year our intention to introduce during 1987 a citizens band radio service at 27 MHz, based on recommendation T/R20-02 of the Conference of European Posts and Telecommunications Administrations (CEPT).

A precise date has yet to be determined as discussions with some users of affected frequencies have not been completed. Once these discussions have reached a conclusion I will make a fuller statement.

Systime plc

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what investigations were made by his Department into the matter of United States Government interference with Systime plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 6 November, at column 559.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now seek compensation from the United States Government for the damage to United Kingdom commercial interests and employment at Systime plc resulting from the United States Department of Commerce action against Systime plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No.

United States (Extra-territorial Controls)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he now proposes to commence action in the international courts pursuant to his formal protest to the United States Government of 26 June 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No.

Personal Account Dealing

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to seek to make illegal or otherwise prevent personal account dealing by members of firms of stockbrokers, security houses or merchant banks.

Mr. Howard: No. Restrictions on personal dealings are already widely applied within firms, and provided that they are vigorously enforced I do not consider it necessary to go further. The Financial Services Act provides SIB, assuming that it becomes the designated agency, with much more effective means of dealing with the matter than the powers now available to me under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act.

As the hon. Member will be aware, the new Financial Services Act powers to investigate alleged cases of insider dealing, which is a criminal offence, came into force on 15 November.

Domestic Appliances (Noise)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement outlining the non-tariff barriers which have been placed by European Economic Community members on the import of domestic appliances from the United Kingdom; which of these various non-tariff barriers relate to the noise emitted by domestic appliances; and what representations he has received from British manufacturers of domestic appliances about the problems created for them in exporting to Europe in consequence of these non-tariff barriers to trade.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the European Community documents on the noise emitted by domestic appliances apply only to appliances motivated by electric power; and whether they apply in any way to battery or hand powered appliances.

Mr. Butcher: The proposed directive does not apply only to electrically powered appliances. The question of limiting the scope to cover only electric household appliances was discussed during negotiations, but the general consensus was that the power source should not be specified thereby allowing for any household appliance to benefit from the directive.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement outlining the manner in which non-EEC producers of lawnmowers and domestic appliances will be able to have their products tested in the new testing stations established under the appropriate directives; and how he plans to fulfil his responsibilities for periodic inspection of lawnmower production under article 7 of the Lawnmowers (Harmonisation of Noise Emission Standards) Regulations in non-EEC countries.

Mr. Butcher: For ease of reference I shall answer this question, which relates to both the lawnmower regulations and the draft noise labelling of domestic appliances directive under the separate headings.

(a.) Lawnmowers: Manufacturers or importers, irrespective of whether they are from EEC or non-EEC countries, can apply to one of any of the listed laboratories in any member state for the necessary tests to be carried out.

In respect to the question as to how we plan to fulfil our obligation for periodic inspections, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 6 November 1986, at columns 560-1.

(b.) Domestic Appliances: The proposed directive on noise labelling of domestic appliances does not envisage the appointment of test organisations. Manufacturers or importers shall be responsible for supplying the information on airborne noise required on the labels when so requested by member states (the United Kingdom will not make noise labelling of domestic appliances mandatory and will not therefore be requesting this information) or if the manufacturer or importer for commercial reasons wants to give it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Lawnmowers (Harmonisation of Noise Emission Standards) Regulations are designed to curb the import of lawnmowers from non-European Economic Community countries; and if he has consulted the general agreement on tariffs and trade organisation on whether the regulations are consistent with the United Kingdom's obligations to that organisation.

Mr. Butcher: The regulations arise from our requirement to implement EC directive 84/538/EEC. This directive removes those technical barriers to trade between member states which arise from different member states rules on noise levels. It is not the intention of this directive to curb imports from non-EEC countries.

Because these regulations implement an EEC directive it was for the Commission on behalf of all member states to notify GATT under its normal GATT obligations; the United Kingdom does not therefore have to take any further action.

Insolvency Legislation

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to bring into force the new insolvency legislation.

Mr. Howard: One of the major provisions of the Insolvency Act 1985, that extending the powers of the Courts to attach personal liability to directors of insolvent companies and to disqualify those found unfitted, was brought into force on 28 April 1986. Subsequently, the contents of that Act, together with those parts of the Companies Act 1985 relating to receivership and winding-up were consolidated into two new statutes — the Insolvency Act 1986 and the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986. By a commencement order published today (20 November) the remaining provisions of the Act passed in 1985 will be brought into force on 29 December 1986. These provisions comprise the introduction of the administrator procedure for companies and other new and revised insolvency procedures relating to receivership, voluntary arrangements, winding-up and bankruptcy.

The licensing of insolvency practitioners, including a ban on unlicensed practice, will also take effect on 29 December.

In addition to the primary legislation there will shortly be published secondary legislation in the form of statutory instruments under the titles given in the list which follows. These statutory instruments, containing a variety of rules and regulations for the operation of the insolvency procedures, and related matters, have been drawn up with the benefit of consultation with insolvency practitioners, members of the legal professions and other interested persons since the passage of the Insolvency Act 1985.

The titles will be:

The Insolvency Rules 1986
The Insolvency Regulations 1986
The Insolvency Fees Order 1986
The Insolvency Proceedings (Monetary Limits) Order 1986
The Insolvent Partnerships Order 1986
The Administration of Insolvent Estates of Deceased Persons Order 1986
The Companies (Disqualification Orders) Regulations 1986
The Companies (Unfair Prejudice Applications) Rules 1986
The Insolvent Companies (Reports on Conduct of Directors) No. 2 Rules 1986
The Insolvency Practitioners Regulations 1986
The Insolvency (Amendment of Subordinate Legislation) Order 1986
The Insolvency (Designation of Relevant Countries and Territories) Order 1986
The Insurance Companies (Winding-Up) (Amendment) Rules 186
The Insolvency (Scotland) Rules 1986
The Receivers (Scotland) Regulations 1986
The Insolvent Companies (Reports on Conduct of Directors) (No. 2) (Scotland) Rules 1986
The Insurance Companies (Winding-Up) (Scotland) Rules 1986
The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1986

Consumer Protection

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what form he expects the code of practice provided for in clause 26 of the Consumer Protection Bill to take.

Mr. Howard: We have had wide-ranging consultations with interested parties on successive drafts of a code of practice on price indications. Copies of the latest draft of the code, which take account of the comments we have so far received, have today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. There will be opportunities for further consultation on the code before it is formally approved.

End User Certificates

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what steps he takes to monitor compliance with end user certificate arrangements on export defence contracts;

(2) if his Department has been informed of sales of military equipment being diverted to Iran in contravention of his export licensing arrangements.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 19 November 1986, c. 186]: Information is not readily available to distinguish between expenditure on advertising in newspapers and that in the press generally. Nor is it readily available for minor amounts spent other than centrally by my Department.

The figures which are readily available are:

	TV	Advertising radio	Newspapers (press)	Promotional literature

EC (Frontier Signs)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what message it is intended to convey on signboards to be erected at the external frontiers of the European Economic Community; at which United Kingdom ports of entry such signboards are to be erected; if the costs will be met from European Economic Community funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

The aim of the new signboards to be introduced from 1 January 1988 at the Community's external frontiers under the terms of the Council resolution of 13 November 1986 is to strengthen and promote the identify and image of the Community in the minds of its citizens and vis-a-vis third countries. The new design containing the name of the member state surrounded by 12 stars will replace existing signs only. Any costs will be met by the member state concerned, but, as the United Kingdom has no signs to replace, no costs will arise here.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Higher Education

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish updated projections of higher education numbers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am today publishing, with the agreement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, new projections of possible student demand for higher education in Great Britain until the year 2000. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Since 1979 the number of home students in higher education has increased by almost 140,000, including an increase of 80,000 in the number of full-time students; the proportion of the 18 to 19-year-olds entering full-time higher education has risen from 12 to 13·9 per cent.; and the number of mature entrants to full-time higher education is up by more than 15 per cent. The proportion of home students on science courses has increased from 44 to 47 per cent. and the proportion who are women from 42 to 44 per cent.

The new projections envisage further increases in numbers over the next few years and illustrates what may happen in the 1990s when the number of 18 to 19-year-olds is going to fall by one-third.

Two projections have been prepared. Projection P assumes broadly the continuation of present trends in numbers obtaining qualifications for entry to higher education, and the present pattern of such entry. For mature students it assumes continuation of the recent higher entry rates. Projection Q illustrates how demand would rise if the proportion of young people qualifying for higher education increased further over the period and if the proportion of those qualifying and of older people wanting to enter higher education also increased. The documnt sets out the detailed assumptions and statistical tehniques which underpin these projections.

Neither of the projections should be interpreted as offering a statement of Government policy. They underline, however, the need to review the implications of the fall in numbers of young people for the supply of highly qualified manpower. In addition, the analysis brings out the extent to which participation rates in higher education will depend on the success of the Government's policies to raise standards in schools, to increase participation in education and training among young people after the age of 16, and to encourage more suitably qualified mature students to enter higher education. The Government's policy remains the provision of places for all who have the intellectual competence, maturity and motivation to benefit from higher education and who wish to do so.

I shall be studying carefully the implications of the new projections for the future funding and planning of higher education, consulting the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education as appropriate.

Latin and Greek

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information his Department has on the job destination of university graduates in Latin and Greek.

Mr. Walden: Information on the destination of 1985 university first degree graduates in classics in Great Britain is as follows. Separate figures for Latin and Greek have not been provided because most courses involve study of Latin and/or Greek in conjunction with other classical studies.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what extra funding is to be made available for the funding of the general certificate of secondary education examinations in further education colleges in Leeds.

Mrs. Rumbold: Additional support for expenditure on books and equipment for the GCSE in this financial year is directed specifically to schools. It is for local authorities to determine the resources made available for GCSE provision in their further education colleges. For the financial year 1987-88 the Government's plans provide for specific expenditure on GCSE non-teaching costs of about £100 million within total planned expenditure of £12,850 million, an increase of 18·8 per cent. in cash on plans for the current year. This should enable authorities to ensure that maintained institutions generally, whether schools or further education colleges, meet the demands of the new examination courses.

Teachers (Shortage)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish, or take steps to establish, the current shortage of qualified teachers of mathematics and technical and craft subjects, respectively, in monitored schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: In January 1986 local authorities in England reported 359 unfilled posts in mathematics and 201 in craft design and technology. Similar information will be collected by my Department in January 1987. Various measures are being taken to improve the position.

City Technical College

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he has had with which local or regional private or public bodies concerning the establishment of a city technical college in the London borough of Newham.

Mrs. Rumbold: Since my right hon. Friend's announcement on 14 October there has been a number of discussions concerning the establishment of city technology colleges in various parts of the country.

Student Grants

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what factors led to the Government's decision to change the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations 1986 schedule 2, part 4, paragraph 21*(b)*, in respect of older students.

Mr. Walden: The criteria for eligibility for the older students allowance were changed in response to representations from a number of organisations about the position of students who had been employed on a part-time basis. Such students, many of whom had achieved significant levels of income, were previously ineligible for the allowance. The Government believe that the revised arrangements are fairer and reflect more closely the purpose of the allowance.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Prevention

3. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of his major crime prevention initiatives.

Mr. Hurd: We are making substantial progress over a very wide range of crime prevention initiatives. We are encouraged by the broad span of organisations and bodies in all sectors which have recognised the possibilities and are taking action. Some 6,000 places on a variety of good local projects have so far been approved under the crime prevention and community programme initiative. Our five towns initiative, where programmes have been developed from detailed area crime profiles, will show practical measures which can be applied elsewhere. There will be further projects in other areas.

Victims of Crime (Compensation)

4. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to accelerate the payment of compensation for victims of crime.

Mr. Hurd: Yes. The Government are providing an additional £114 million over the next three years to speed up the processing of applications under the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

62. Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has had to his new proposals to compensate the victims of crime from the proceeds of criminals.

Mr. Mellor: The White Paper "Criminal Justice: Plans for Legislation" (Cmnd. 9658) announced the Government's intention to encourage the wider use of compensation orders by the criminal courts and to allow compensation to be paid, in appropriate cases, out of the sale of forfeited property. In the comments received on the White Paper, these proposals are widely welcomed. The Criminal Justice Bill, which is now before Parliament, gives effect to the proposals and would also allow compensation to be paid in appropriate circumstances out of proceeds confiscated from the offender under a confiscation order.

Prisoners (Statistics)

11. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners at present serving custodial sentences aged under 25 years had been unemployed for a minimum of two years prior to arrest and conviction.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of adult offenders convicted of indictable offences were sentenced to immediate imprisonment in 1975 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 7.20 of the issue for 1985 published on 20 November). A total of 18·8 per cent. of those aged 21 and over found guilty of an indictable offence in 1985 received a sentence of immediate imprisonment; the corresponding figure for 1975 was 13·4 per cent.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the prison budget was spent on education in 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The amounts spent directly on education in prisons in England and Wales were £9·2 million in the financial year 1980-81 and £13·5 million in the financial year 1985-86. These amounts represent, respectively, 2·3 per cent. and 2·2 per cent. of the total expenditure on the prisons vote in the years in question. The main items of expenditure excluded from these amounts are the costs of the prison officer manpower and prison buildings used in connection with the provision of education services and the pay of vocational training and construction industry training instructors.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many prisoners did not have access to in-cell sanitation at night in 1966, 1976 and 1986, respectively; and how many prisoners he can estimate will still not have access to in-cell sanitation at night by 1991.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that information about access to sanitation is not available for 1966 and 1976 in the form requested. In February 1986 there were approximately 41,200 certified places—including some temporarily out of use for refurbishment — of which approximately 22,000 had neither integral sanitation nor some means of access to sanitation. Because of the overcrowding of these cells, the average number slopping out in 1985 was about 26,000 out of an average total prison population of approximately 46,200. On the basis of the building schemes at present in progress or planned, there will be just under 20,000 places in 1991 still lacking access to sanitation. The number of prisoners slopping out in 1991 will depend on the extent to which there is still overcrowding in prisons which lack access to sanitation.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners shared two or three to a cell in 1966, 1976 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The highest number of prisoners in England and Wales who shared cells certified for one prisoner in 1966 was 8,700 of whom 7,206 were three to a cell and 1,494 were two to a cell.

The highest number of prisoners in England and Wales who shared cells certified for one prisoner in 1976 was 16,435, of whom 5,709 were three to a cell and 10,726 were two to a cell. The highest number recorded so far in 1986 was 17,643, of whom 3,867 were three to a cell and 13,766 were two to a cell.

Autocrime

14. Mr. Carttiss asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made since the Prime Minister's seminar on crime prevention in developing measures to combat car theft.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On Tuesday, the Home Office standing conference on crime prevention received a report from its working group on car security. that report points to publicity projects by Government, motor manufacturers, car insurers and others which have heightened public awareness of the problem. It also refers to the production of a British standard on vehicle security. I attended the launch yesterday of the first part of that standard and other parts will follow shortly.

Visitors (Representations)

15. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce any further exceptions to his decisions not to permit Members of Parliament to make representations on behalf of people visiting their relatives in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: We have no plans for further changes to the guidelines on the handling of representations by Members in immigration cases, but the new arrangements will be kept under review.

Interviews (Tape Recording)

16. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces are now using tape recorders to record information from suspects during interviews; and how soon this will be extended to all police forces.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Some 34 police forces have been allocated funds to prepare and equip interview rooms. Further funds will be allocated to extend and complete coverage over a five-year period up to 1991.

Metropolitan Police

17. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost of the Metropolitan police service for the last financial year.

Mr. Hurd: The accounts of the Metropolitan police fund have not yet been certified, but provisionally the total net revenue expenditure on the Metropolitan police for 1985-86 was £770·849 million.

Civil Defence

18. Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the results of his pilot study for improving regional civil defence co-ordination will be available for reporting to the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This study is expected to be complete in the second half of 1987. A report will be made to the House.

19. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take to improve the co-ordinating arrangements for civil defence planning in Government Departments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer my hon. Friend to the earlier reply given to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden).

20. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish a civil defence newsletter for volunteers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave earlier to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn). The quarterly periodical is intended for all those with an interest in civil defence, including volunteers.

22. Mr. Gilroy Bevan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to report to the House the results of his pilot study for improving regional civil defence co-ordination.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave earlier to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost).

50. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to establish a civil defence inspectorate to monitor local authority progress on civil defence.

64. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to establish a civil defence inspectorate in order to monitor local authority progress on civil defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Not at present: the planned programme for implementation of the 1983 regulations, issued to local authorities on 30 October this year as Home Office Circular ES 1/1986, provides the framework for the Home Office civil defence adviser and other officials to monitor progress.

53. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is considering setting maximum complements for local authority civil defence staff.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No, but officials will discuss staff resources as part of the annual discussion with county level authorities within the framework of the new planned programme for implementation of the 1983 regulations as set out in Home Office circular ES 1/1986, a copy of which is in the Library.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

21. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he commenced his review of the case against the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Hurd: Following the "World in Action" programme on the case on 28 October 1985. But since then we have had to take account of the fresh suggestions made in Mr. Mullin's book which was published in June.

25. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available to relatives of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings a copy of all records kept by Dr. Frank Skuse and the Home Office laboratory at Chorley in relation to their case.

Mr. Mellor: No, Sir. It is the policy of the forensic science service not to release case notes.

30. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to inform the forensic scientist Mr. David Baldock of the alleged error in the information supplied to him on 20 May 1985 by the director of the Home Office laboratory at Chorley.

56. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Griess test formula supplied to the forensic scientist Mr. David Baldock by the director of the Home Office laboratory at Chorley on 20 May 1985.

Mr. Mellor: In May 1985, in response to a request from Mr. Baldock, the then director of the Chorley forensic science laboratory supplied details to him of the Griess test performed by Dr. Skuse in the Birmingham pub bombings case. Mr. Baldock was told that the strength of the caustic soda solution used by Dr. Skuse was 1 per cent. After the broadcast of the "World in Action" programme on 28 October 1985, and following a decision to carry out a re-appraisal of the Griess test, it became clear that the strength of the caustic soda solution used by Dr. Skuse was almost certainly 0·1 per cent.

We very much regret that incorrect information appears to have been given to Mr. Baldock and that this was not drawn to his attention subsequently.

33. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has now completed his investigations into the cases of those convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: We are continuing to consider the various representations which have been made in regard to the men's convictions. We hope to be able to reach a decision shortly.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the representations he has received in 1986 for the release of Paddy Hill, Robert Hunter, Noel McIlkenny, Billy Power, Johnnie Walker and Hugh Callaghan, currently imprisoned; when he expects to make a decision on their cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have received representations expressing concern about the convictions of these six men from, among others, Members of both Houses; from religious leaders in this country and the Irish Republic; from the Irish Government; and from members of parliamentary delegations from that country. With regard to our consideration of the case, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy).

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

23. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he intends to take to encourage the further growth of neighbourhood or home watch schemes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are now some 16,000 neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales which represents a 100 per cent. increase in less than 12 months. We will encourage further growth and development in a number of ways. A national neighbourhood watch conference will take place in Newcastle on 8 December. This will provide an opportunity to consider how we can build further upon the successes of neighbourhood watch.

We are to produce a new quarterly magazine, "Good Neighbour" which will be launched on the day of the conference. This will help to disseminate ideas and projects.

38. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the burglary rate in areas operating a neighbourhood watch scheme compares with the rate before the scheme was introduced.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The full effects of neighbourhood watch on burglary rates in areas in which schemes operate would be difficult to assess. Where police forces have isolated crime figures for individual schemes, the results have indicated that neighbourhood watch can reduce burglary in the scheme area.

Section 11 Funding (Immigrants)

24. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which local authorities his Department is currently reviewing the use of section 11 funding, apart from normal annual reviews.

Mr. Waddington: We are seeking further information about the intended use of certain posts in Brent where my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has also asked Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools to carry out an inspection; and we have recently notified Avon county council of our conclusions following inquiries about the use made of certain section 11 supported posts by the Avon multi-cultural education centre.

Basildon (Courthouse)

26. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the proposed building of a new courthouse in Basildon.

Mr. Mellor: Essex county council is responsible for providing the new magistrates' court, in consultation with the magistrates' courts committee. The council has submitted details of the accommodation to be provided and we are now awaiting further information to enable us to set the cost limit for the scheme.

Blast and Radiation Casualties

27. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further work his Department will now undertake on blast and radiation casualties.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This is a matter which is kept under review: research reports were published on the effects of radiation and blast in June 1985 and September 1986 respectively. Copies are available in the Library.

Chemical Weapons

28. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress his Department has made in developing protective measures against chemical weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The work is complex and wide-ranging, and is not yet complete.

55. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has carried out on the likely civilian casualties which might result from an attack on the United Kingdom with chemical weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government are examining ways of warning and protecting the population against attack with chemical weapons. This work is not yet complete. The Government do not make detailed estimates of casualties which would depend on the strategic intention of the enemy and circumstances at the time.

BBC (Chairman)

29. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and what subjects were discussed.

31. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend met the chairman of the BBC on 14 October, before his formal appointment, and discussed with him a number of matters.

Church of Jesus Christ Christian

32. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the entry into the United Kingdom of leading members of the Church of Jesus Christ Christian; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have as yet no firm evidence to suggest that leading members of this organisation have entered the United Kingdom.

Police Manpower, Manchester

34. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the level of police manpower in Greater Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We receive representations from time to time on this subject but no record has been kept of the number. The Greater Manchester police authority is responsible for determining the police establishment of the force, subject to my right hon. Friend's approval. A total of 208 additional police posts have been approved for the force since May 1979 and the existing police establishment is 6,943. The strength of the force on 30 September 1986 was 6,755, an increase of 315 since May 1979, and the force has a civilianisation programme which should release more officers to operational duties. I understand that the police authority envisages that the force will reach its full police establishment during the next financial year, 1987-88.

Visitors (Entry Permission)

35. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many tourists from the Indian subcontinent, arriving at Heathrow in the days before 15 October, were subsequently refused leave to enter.

Mr. Waddington: It is not possible to provide the information requested. The statistics collected centrally of passengers refused leave to enter within a given period do not record the date of arrival, nor do they distinguish tourists from other passengers. In addition, some passengers who arrived before 15 October and who have been temporarily admitted are still subject to further examination.

Crime (Clear-up Rate)

36. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available, what is the total number of crimes reported to the police which were not cleared up.

Mr. Mellor: Numbers of offences recorded and cleared up are published annually in the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". The estimated number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1985 but not cleared up is 2,215,000 excluding offences of criminal damage of value £20 or under. Because an offence may be recorded and cleared up in different years it is possible to give only an approximate figure.

Victims of Crime (Compensation)

37. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the subject of compensation for victims of crime.

Mr. Mellor: Following the publication earlier this year of the White Paper "Criminal Justice — Plans for Legislation" (Cmnd. 9658), we have received a number of representations from interested groups on the Government's proposals to extend the compensation powers of the criminal courts and to place the criminal injuries compensation scheme on a statutory footing. The proposals have been generally welcomed. In addition, we receive a steady flow of correspondence from hon. Members, members of the public and others on the powers of the courts in this area and on the working of the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

Visas

39. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visas have been issued since 1 October.

Mr. Waddington: The information available centrally is as follows: 670 visas for entry to the United Kingdom were issued to Sri Lankan citizens in Sri Lanka in October 1986. Provisional information available so far indicates that some 10,600 entry certificates and visas for visitors, students and transit passengers were issued in the period 28 September to 24 October to applicants in Bangladesh, India, Pakistan, Ghana and Nigeria.

51. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effects on immigrants of the introduction of the visa system for the Indian subcontinent.

Mr. Waddington: The new visa requirements are an administrative arrangement. They affect mainly people seeking entry as visitors and students who are citizens of Bangladesh, India and Pakistan as well as Ghana, and in due course Nigeria, by moving the point at which a decision is made on their claim to admission from the ports of entry to our missions abroad.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

40. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the report of the interdepartmental working party on criminal injuries compensation.

Mr. Mellor: The report was published on 6 November. As my right hon. Friend announced then at c. 539, the Government consider that the criminal injuries compensation scheme ought now to be put on to a statutory basis broadly as recommended by the working party. Our proposals are contained in the Criminal Justice Bill which is now before this House.

Licensing Hours

41. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on licensing hours in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Since 1 August we have received 43 letters from hon. Members on behalf of constituents, 14 letters from members of the public and three letters from organisations expressing views on this matter. Of these 60 letters, 53 supported relaxations in the existing law and seven were opposed.

49. Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to relax licensing hours in certain areas.

Mr. Waddington: There are no present plans to do so. The Government support the case for a relaxation in permitted hours in principle throughout England and Wales, but we cannot say when legislation might be introduced.

76. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met representatives of the Flexi Laws action group to discuss reform of licensing laws.

Mr. Waddington: We have not met representatives of the Flexi Laws action group as such, but we have met members of some of the group's constituent organisations.

Greater Manchester (Deputy Chief Constable)

42. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete his internal inquiry into events surrounding the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester.

Mr. Hurd: I have asked for the observations of those principally concerned with the investigation of the allegations against Mr. Stalker in order to inform myself of all the aspects of the case and consider whether there are any lessons to be learned for the investigation of any future allegations against senior police officers. I am still waiting for the observations of some of those principally concerned.

Electoral Franchise

43. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider introducing legislation to extend the electoral franchise to include non-United Kingdom citizens who pay domestic rates.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The franchise is presently enjoyed by British citizens, citizens of other Commonwealth countries and Irish citizens. We have no plans to extend it to citizens of other countries who pay domestic rates.

Prisoners (Statistics)

44. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many men and women are in prison at present.

Mr. Mellor: The total prison population in England and Wales on 14 November 1986 was 46,000 males and 1,564 females.

Sudbury Open Prison

45. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have absconded from Sudbury open prison in the last two years; whether he is satisfied with security arrangements there in the light of the absconding on the morning of 10 November of a prisoner convicted of murder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Eighty prisoners absconded from Sudbury prison during 1985 and 50 during the first 10 months of this year. All of these were serving determinate sentences.

A life sentence prisoner is considered for transfer to an open prison only after careful assessment in a number of different prisons over a period of years. The advice of the parole board is sought in every case and transfer to an open prison is subject to the personal authority of a Minister. As in every decision relating to the progress towards the possible release of such prisoners, public safety is the paramount consideration and no life sentence prisoner is transferred to an open prison until he is thought no longer to present any serious risk of re-offending. I understand that my noble Friend the Minister of State will soon meet my hon. Friend to discuss the matter.

Shops Act

46. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in October and November on the subject of the Shops Act.

Mr. Waddington: Since 1 October we have received 69 representations on the subject of the Shops Act 1950.

Metropolitan Police (Expenditure)

47. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has any proposals to improve financial control and management of expenditure on the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Officials continue to work closely with the Metropolitan police in the development and refinement of financial controls and the management of expenditure.

Crime Statistics (London)

48. Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a statement showing the total number of crimes committed in each borough in the Metropolitan police area in the most recent 12 months for which figures are available, compared with the total committed in the earliest 12 months since 1977 for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of notifiable offences recorded by the police in each London borough in 1978 are published in "1983-84 Annual Abstract of Greater London Statistics", Volume 16 (Table 147) a copy of which is available in the Library. Recent quarterly and annual figures are placed regularly in the Library.

Young People (Crime)

52. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans for new initiatives to counter crime amongst young people.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On Tuesday the Home Office standing conference on crime prevention decided that the theme for its working groups for the coming year would be "Young People and Crime". It is to set up three working groups to look at: juvenile crime; advice on child molestation and abuse; and young people and alcohol. Arrangements are now in hand to set up these groups which will report their findings and present their recommendations to standing conference next November.

There are, in addition, a number of projects under the five local crime prevention initiatives focusing on the problem of crime and young people.

Domestic Violence

54. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last discussed with chief constables the subject of domestic violence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: During the course of this year the Department has been engaged in discussions with the Association of Chief Police Officers about the police response to recommendations made by the Women's National Commission in its report on violence against women. This included domestic violence, and guidance was issued to chief officers in Home Office circular 69/1986 on 15 October 1986.

Weapon Sales (Mail Order)

57. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to prohibit the sale by mail order of lethal weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are no plans to do so. The provisions of the Firearms Act 1968 apply to all purchases of firearms regardless of the method of sale. The Department issued a guidance notice in January to traders, including mail order firms, urging that martial arts weapons should not be sold to those under 18, or to those who cannot produce evidence of membership of a bona fide martial arts club.

Violence Against Children

58. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from organisations concerned with the welfare of children on the origins of violence directed against children.

Mr. Mellor: I am not aware of any recent representations on this subject from welfare organisations.

Racial Attacks and Harassment

59. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last discussed with chief constables the subject of racial attacks and harassment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The last opportunity that my right hon. Friend had to raise the subject of racial attacks and harassment generally with chief officers of police was in his speech to the Association of Chief Police Officers' summer conference in June. Problems of this kind are also discussed in the course of visits to individual police forces.

Radio Licences

60. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to reintroduce radio licences.

Mr. Mellor: No, though we are still considering the recommendation by the committee on financing the BBC that there might be a licence specifically related to car radios.

Hampshire Constabulary

61. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give further consideration to an increase in the establishment of the Hampshire constabulary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is the responsibility of the Hampshire police authority to determine the authorised establishment of the force, subject to my right hon. Friend's approval. In August 1986, 21 additional police posts were approved for the force, meeting in full the last application by the police authority. We have not received an application for a further increase in the force establishment, but applications for increases will be considered on the basis of proven needs and in the light of advice from Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary.

Female Prisoners

63. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of female prisoners are on remand; and how this compares with the male prison population.

Mr. Mellor: On 30 September 1986, 26 per cent. of the female prisoners in prison department establishments in England and Wales were untried or convicted unsentenced. The corresponding proportion for male prisoners was 22·5 per cent.

"Trial and Error"

65. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider the evidence regarding the alleged wrongful conviction and imprisonment of the Maguires for an explosives offence, presented by Mr. Robert Kee in his book "Trial and Error", a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend is looking carefully at Mr. Kee's book in order to determine whether it raises any new points which require further investigation or which may affect his earlier decision that he would not be justified in referring the case to the Court of Appeal.

Police Officers (Deployment)

66. Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on policy on the deployment of police officers between traffic duties and crime investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We receive representations from time to time on this matter but no record has been kept of the number. The day-to-day deployment of police officers is the responsibility of the chief officer of police. It is for him to decide on the priority to be given to each aspect of policing. The 330 additional police posts which have been approved for provincial forces since April 1986 have been to meet a range of specific needs, including more foot patrols, drugs work, CID officers and motorway policing.

Television Licence (Pensioners)

67. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received seeking the abolition of the television licence fee for all pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Since the publication of the report of the committee on financing the BBC we have received 35 letters—in 22 cases referred to us by hon. Members—suggesting that pensioners should be exempt from the television licence fee. A further 36 letters have suggested a reduced fee. We are still considering the committee's recommendations concerning the licensing system.

Civil Defence College

68. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what improvements he has introduced to the Civil Defence college in the last year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of courses have been revised and updated, and work is in hand on improving facilities. This work is continuing.

Firearms

69. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was for each year since 1977, the total number of offences known to the police in which firearms were used.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The readily available information relates to notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used and is published in table 3.1 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1985", published this week.

Sunday Trading

70. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received seeking alterations in the law relating to Sunday trading offences.

Mr. Waddington: Since 1 August 1986 we have received 88 representations seeking alterations in the law relating to Sunday trading offences.

Magistrates' Courts (Buildings)

71. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amount is budgeted for in the current year to improve magistrates' court buildings.

Mr. Mellor: In 1986-87 a capital allocation of £27·5 million has been earmarked for magistrates' courts building works including site purchase.

Criminal Statistics

72. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of crimes committed in England and Wales during the most recent 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in the 12 months ending 30 June 1986 was 3,745,000. This figure has been published in "Home Office Statistical Bulletin" issue number 25/86.

Prison Building Programme

73. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the prison building programme.

Mr. Mellor: The prison building programme includes 20 new establishments of which three have now been completed, five are being built and the remainder are at various stages of design or planning. Together these new establishments will provide some 10,600 new places by the mid 1990's. In addition we are undertaking an extensive programme of modernisation and redevelopment of the existing prison estate with major capital work in progress or planned at about 100 establishments, including almost all of the Victorian local prisons. This part of the programme includes a number of place producing schemes which will provide a further 6,600 new places by about the same date, making a total of 17,200 in all.

Remand Prisoners

74. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest available figure for the total number of prisoners held on remand; what percentage of the total prison population this represents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On 30 September 1986, about 10,620 untried or convicted unsentenced persons were held in prison department establishments in England and Wales, about 23 per cent. of the total population of such establishments.

Trespass

75. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the laws of trespass.

Mr. Mellor: We regularly receive representations about the law on squatting. In recent months we have also received representations about the problems concerned by such groups as the Peace Convoy, the members of which trespass on land with intent to reside. Section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986, when in force, will provide the police with a power in certain circumstances to direct such trespassers to quit the land.

Young Persons (Sentences)

77. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of persons under 25 years of age currently serving sentences in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, on 30 September 1986 about 18,040 sentenced persons in prison department establishments in England and Wales were aged under 25 years.

Citizenship

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available the income and expenditure account for the administration of citizenship application for 1985-86.

Mr. Hurd: I have today place in the Library of the House, a copy of the nationality fees income and expenditure account for the 12 months ended 31 March 1986.

Voting Rights

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) Irish nationals and (b) Community nationals have the right to vote in Britain; and how many European Community nationals are resident in the United Kingdom on the same basis.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On the basis of the number of persons who reported that they were citizens of the Irish Republic or of Commonwealth countries in the most recent labour force survey, it is estimated that nearly 500,000 citizens of the Irish Rebublic and nearly 500,000 citizens of Commonwealth countries aged 18 or over were usually resident in the United Kingdom in mid-1984 and therefore had the right to vote. The corresponding estimate for nationals of European Community countries, excluding the Irish Republic, is between 150,000 and 200,000. EC nationals do not have the right to vote.

Racial Incidents (Circular)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, detailing his consultation arrangements in respect of territorial operations instructions 1/86, guidelines on dealing with racial incidents; what is the reason for the long delay in consulting on it with the Commission for Racial Equality and relevant community relations councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The best practice guidelines for recording and monitoring racial incidents set minimum requirements for the Metropolitan police response to such incidents. The guidelines also make suggestions for local initiatives to combat racial attacks particularly through a multi-agency approach.

The Metropolitan police have held many meetings and seminars on the problem of racial attacks in London in which local organisations, including community relations councils, have taken part. A seminar on this subject took place on 29 October in No. 1 area of the Metropolitan police, which includes Leyton.

Brixton Prison

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain why the Brixton prison authorities do not issue pullovers or jumpers to prisoners until October; whether he will review this matter and ensure that such warm clothing is supplied upon request; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: There is no restriction on what time of year pullovers and jumpers may be issued at Brixton prison.

Police Training (Racial Stereotyping)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes any improvements in police training to overcome the application of racial stereotypes to black people as recommended by the Home Office research study, "Police—Public Encounters"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The study of "Police — Public Encounters" was designed to produce material for training in policing skills. It draws particular attention to the need to overcome racial stereotypes of black people and provides resource material for training to that purpose. Significant changes are being made to police training to ensure that such problems are addressed and the study is making a useful contribution to the effectiveness of such training.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the disclosing of the absolute number of certificates signed by him under section 27 of the Data Protection Act will affect national security.

Mr. Waddington: It would undermine the purpose for which exemptions under section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984 exist if detailed information about them were made public. I do not believe that details of the number of certificates signed can sensibly be considered in isolation from other aspects of section 27.

Marriage Guidance Council

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much assistance the Marriage Guidance Council has received from public funds each year since 1979, expressed in cash terms, real terms and as a percentage change from 1979.

Mr. Mellor: Grants in aid to the National Marriage Guidance Council for the years 1979-80 to 1986-87 were:

	Grant (cash terms) £	Grant (real terms) £[1]	Percentage change from 1979-80 (real terms)[1]
1979-80	418,000	—	—
1980-81	555,000	467,865	+11·9
1981-82	704,000	539,968	+29·2
1982-83	750,000	537,000	+28·5
1983-84	788,000	539,780	+29·1
1984-85	827,460	543,641	+30·1
1985-86	864,570	536,033	+28·2
1986-87	890,500	535,191	+28·0

[1] Real terms figures are the cash figures adjusted to 1979-80 price levels by excluding the effect of general inflation as measured by the GDP deflator.

Since its introduction in 1981-82 the cash terms increase in each year has been in accordance with the standard revaluation factor applied to all cash limited votes as required by the Government's system of cash planning.

Additionally, grants have been given to the National Marriage Guidance Council (a) by the Manpower Services Commission, under the voluntary projects programme, and (b) by the Department of Health and Social Services, towards the cost of developing the council's marital sexual therapy services, as follows:

	(a) MSC grant (cash terms) £	(b) DHSS grant (cash terms) £
1979-80	—	10,000
1980-81	—	20,000
1981-82	—	20,000
1982-83	—	20,000
1983-84	53,460	35,000
1984-85	231,270	30,000
1985-86	173,040	25,000
1986-87	79,800	—

Vandalism

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department by how much the recorded incidence of vandalism has changed each year since 1980; and what legislation he proposes to introduce to seek to reduce it.

Mr. Mellor: Figures for the incidence of criminl damage are pubished annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" and in quarterly bulletins. We are supporting local action against vandalism as part of our crime prevention strategy: this does not require legislation.

Gaming Act 1968 (Amusement Arcades)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to seek to amend the Gaming Act 1968 with regard to children gambling in amusement arcades; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no plans at present for legislation on this subject, but we are keeping the question of the adequacy of the law under review.

Prison Workshops

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long was the average working week for prison workshops in 1970, 1973, 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The figures are as follows:

	Hours
1970-71	26·0
1973-74	26·0
1980-81	19·0
1985-86	17·7

These are net working hours, that is net of interruptions and stoppages. They relate only to industrial workshops; farms and gardens activities are excluded. Changes in the systems for compiling the figures over the period mean that while the figures are indicative of the general trend they are not entirely comparable.

Leeds Prison

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Leeds prison on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: Seven hundred and seventy.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Leeds prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; how many classes took place and for how many hours; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during the week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the workshops were open for an average of nearly 12 hours; an average of 259 prisoners were employed each working day in workshops and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 84 education classes —60 day-time and 24 evening—took place for a total of 160½ hours; there were an average of 7·6 inmates in each class. It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells, since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, association, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out of cell activities.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average population of Leeds prison in the most convenient recent week.

Mr. Mellor: Prison population figures are collected centrally once a week. On 14 November 1986, Her Majesty's prison Leeds held 1,298 prisoners.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Leeds prison; how many baths or showers is each prisoner currently allowed per week; and how many changes of clothes is each prisoner currently allowed per week.

Mr. Mellor: The number of baths, showers and toilets available are as follows:

	Number
Baths	6
Showers	42
WCs	99
Urinals	76

Each prisoner is normally allowed one bath or shower per week and an additional bath or shower when he makes use of the gymnasium. Additional baths or showers are available for prisoners employed on jobs that are of a physically dirty nature or on return from court appearances.

Prisoners at Leeds have one change of clothes per week consisting of two shirts, two pair of socks, two pairs of underpants and two vests. Overclothing is changed as necessary, but on return from court prisoners receive a full kit of clean clothes.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many square feet of exercise space are available in Leeds prison.

Mr. Mellor: A total of 40,837 sq ft in exercise yards, 5,662 sq ft in the hard surfaced games area, and 1,690 sq ft in the gymnasium.

Wright Memoirs

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with his opposite number in Australia regarding the possible rôle of the Australian Government in the case involving the proposed publication of Mr. Peter Wright's memoirs in Australia.

Mr. Hurd: None.

Drugs

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the Government's current campaign against drug pushers.

Mr. Mellor: We are continuing to step up action on all aspects of our strategy. Recent developments include the agreement of European Community Ministers, at a meeting chaired by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, to a seven-point plan for combating drug misuse. The announcement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that 460 further posts will be allocated for customs work, including 110 more specialist drugs investigators, support and legal staff; the introduction of subordinate legislation to control the so-called "designer drugs"; and the implementation of a number of the provisions of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 as part of a phased implementation programme which will be completed as quickly as possible. In 1985 nearly 5,000 people were convicted of drug trafficking offences, an increase of about 20 per cent. compared with 1984.

EC Broadcasting Directive

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the directive on broadcasting was published by the Commission; when it will be considered by the Council of Ministers; and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the provisions of the directive.

Mr. Mellor: The draft directive was published on 7 May and is under discussion in an official working group of the Council. We do not believe that a case of Community legislation on these aspects of broadcasting has yet been made out.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what representations he has received from the British Broadcasting Corporation, the Independent Broadcasting Authority and other interested bodies regarding the European Economic Community broadcasting directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have received representations from most of the relevant interests, including the broadcasters, the cable service providers and the programme production, advertising and copyright interests. Most of the interested bodies are sceptical of the need for Community legislation. While a few would welcome a directive on broadcast advertising if the present text could be suitably amended, there appears to be general opposition to the other provisions of the draft directive.

Shotgun Licences

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many shotgun licences were in issue at the most recent date for which figures are available; if he is satisfied with the arrangements for ensuring that licences are renewed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A total of 819,333 shotgun certificates were on issue in England and Wales on 31 December 1985. A joint Home Office/Association of Chief Police Officers working party, which reported in 1984, recommended that reminders should be sent to all certificate holders before their certificates expire. I understand that most chief constables have adopted this recommendation, but the responsibility for renewing a certificate ultimately rests with the certificate holder.

Traffic (London)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a meeting with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to discuss traffic management in London.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no plans to do so, but regular discussions take place between the police and the highway authorities, including the Department of Transport, responsible for traffic management in London.

Toxic Chemicals

Mr. Silkin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether in the light of the recent environmental disasters in the Rhine, he is satisfied that the fire brigades have adequate contingency plans and sufficient absorbent materials to be able to contain the damage from accidents in the United Kingdom involving toxic chemicals rather than spreading the effects of the chemicals by hosing them down.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 responsibility for preparing contingency plans rests with individual manufacturers whose activities involve the use of dangerous chemicals. All emergency services—including fire authorities—are considered in the formulation of such plans and in particular cases will make necessary provision in the light of the likely scale and nature of the hazard with due regard to environmental considerations.

Diet and Behaviour

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are for experiments to be conducted at a youth detention centre by his Department under the auspices of the British Society of Nutritional Medicine involving the interacting of diet and behaviour; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are not aware of plans for any such experiments to be conducted at an establishment for which we are responsible.

Amusement Arcades

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been secured against the owners of amusement arcades for allowing under-aged people to gamble on their premises in 1985 and 1986, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None, as it is not an offence to allow young people to gamble in amusement arcades.

WALES

Council Houses (Renovation)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total expenditure on renovating council houses in Cardiff, West over the past four years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information on expenditure for the renovation of council houses is not available by parliamentary constituency. The information for Cardiff city council is as follows:

Gross capital expenditure on renovating council houses

	(£000s)
1982-83	3,898
1983-84	3,890
1984-85	4,392
1985-86	8,379

Council House Sales

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in Cardiff up until the last available figures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Between April 1980 and September 1986, 4,290 council dwellings had been sold to sitting tenants in Cardiff. This figure (the latest available) includes both voluntary and right-to-buy sales. I am satisfied with the rate at which Cardiff and other local authorities in Wales are now processing claims by tenants to purchase their homes. The measures to be introduced by our new Housing and Planning Act will encourage more tenants to exercise the right-to-buy their homes.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses are pending to be sold to sitting tenants in Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: At 30 September 1986 Cardiff city council was handling 482 right-to-buy applications from sitting tenants whose claims had been accepted but who had not yet completed the purchase of their homes. Information for voluntary sales which may be pending is not available.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been renovated in Cardiff West over the past four years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information on the number of council houses renovated is not available by parliamentary constituency. In Wales the information was first collected by housing authorities, by calendar year, in 1984. Cardiff city council did not improve any of its stock in that year. 121 houses were improved in 1985. Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants, up to the last available date, in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Between April 1980 and September 1986, 48,263 council dwellings had been sold to sitting tenants in Wales. This figure (the latest available) includes both voluntary and right-to-buy sales.

Community Care

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will detail the schemes for community care initiated by his Department since publication of his Department's document "A Good Old Age".

Mr. Mark Robinson: The purpose of "A Good Old Age" was to promote change and development in the pattern of services to elderly people. The response to that document demonstrated strong support from health and local authorities and other agencies for a policy of community care, and progress towards that objective is already being made through existing spending programmes. We intend to announce very soon the details of a grant scheme to stimulate more innovative and cost effective approaches to community care for the elderly.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up an inquiry into the accuracy of the recent unemployment figures in respct of the Pembroke constituency and for individual wards within that constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am not aware of any inaccuracy in the unemployment figures for the Pembroke parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up an inquiry into the accuracy of the recent unemployment figures in respect of the Newport, East and Newport, West constituencies and for individual wards within those constituencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Delay in using new postcodes for Newport has, in recent months, caused some unemployed claimants to be assigned, for counting purposes, to the wrong electoral ward. This affected the distribution of claimants between the parliamentary constituencies of Newport, East and Newport, West, but not the overall total for the Newport travel-to-work area nor, therefore, the unemployment rate. Starting with the September figure this error has now been corrected. I see no need to set up an inquiry.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what facilities exist for the call and recall of women for the purposes of cervical cancer screening in each health authority in Wales at the latest available date.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Gwent, Gwynedd and Powys district health authorities currently operate a manual call and recall service for cervical cancer screening. Following the allocation of an additional £400,000 per annum by the Welsh Office, all authorities are in the process of establishing a computerised call and recall service using the computers of the family practitioner committees. As a step towards this, the family practitioner committees in Clwyd, Dyfed, Gwent, Powys and South Glamorgan are already computerised.

Defective Housing

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will urgently consider allocating extra finances to Cardiff city council in order to renovate Smith PRC houses in Cardiff, West; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No approved repair method is yet available for Smith PRC houses and Cardiff city council has not sought additional funds from our Department for these properties.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representation he has received concerning the interpretation of the defect-free value of PRC dwellings under the terms of the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh Office has received representations and inquiries from two local authorities and one housing action group about the interpretation of the defect-free value of PRC dwellings under the terms of the Housing Defects Act 1984 (now part XVI of the Housing Act 1985).

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been made to date to each local housing authority in Wales under the Housing Defects Act 1984; how many have been granted; and how many have been rejected for exceeding in cost the value of the dwelling in question.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information on the number of applications made and granted is given in the following table. It is not open to local authorities to reject applications on grounds of cost; where the cost of repair would exceed the value of the repaired dwelling, assistance must be offered by way of repurchase.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many wholesale repurchases of PRC dwellings have been made to date by each housing authority in Wales under the Housing Defects Act 1984 since its inception; and, for each authority, how many have followed rejection of a refurbishment grant application on the grounds of excessive cost.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There have been 40 repurchases of PRC dwellings by housing authorities in Wales since the introduction of the Housing Defects Act in December 1984. The information by authority is given in the following table. The reasons for authorities deciding on repurchase instead of reinstatement are not collected centrally.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the net cost to date and in this financial year to the latest available date, for each local housing authority in Wales of (a) refurbishment grants, (b) wholesale repurchases and (c) wholesale repurchases following rejection of a refurbishment grant application on the grounds of excessive cost under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The cost to date of reinstatement grants and repurchases is given in the following table. The reasons for repurchases by authorities are not held centrally.

Note: Figures have been rounded.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many refurbishment grant applications made under the Housing Defects Act 1984 have exceeded in value that of the PRC dwelling in question by more than (a) 10 per cent. and (b) 20 per cent. in each housing authority in Wales to date;

(2) what has been the average cost of refurbishment grant applications made under the Housing Defects Act 1984 which have exceeded the value of the dwelling in question: (a) prior to the new grant limit and (b) since the new grant limit.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I am not aware of any. The relevant legislation provides for assistance by repurchase in cases where the cost of the repair is likely to exceed the value of the dwelling in question.

ENERGY

Cross-Channel Electricity Link

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to assist in the marketing of the technology successfully developed for the construction of the cross-Channel electricity link.

Mr. Goodlad: Future marketing of the technology involved in this project is a matter for the companies concerned supported, as appropriate, by the CEGB and British Electricity International.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Terrorism

80. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of initiatives within the Council of Ministers of the European Community to combat terrorism.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) on 29 October, at column 177, and the statements made on 28 October, at column 167, and 14 November, at column 221, by my right hon. and learned Friend.

On 10 November my right hon. and learned Friend was able to announce on behalf of 11 member states a number of measures designed to strengthen counter terrorist co-operation and to send a clear signal to Syria. These decisions demonstrate the continuing resolve among our EC partners to co-operate in adopting practical counter-terrorist measures. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, as President, has ensured that the TREVI machinery has been used to the full in the fight against terrorism.

GCHQ Cheltenham

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many employees at Government communications headquarters have joined the staff federation; and what proportion of the total number of employees this represents.

Mr. Renton: It is not the practice to reveal details of the strength of the security and intelligence agencies, but I can inform my hon. Friend that more than 49 per cent. of the staff at GCHQ have now joined the Government communications staff federation. This is a higher percentage than ever previously belonged to any single union at GCHQ.

Mr. John McCarthy

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the whereabouts of Mr. John McCarthy, a British journalist being held in the Lebanon after kidnap.

Mr. Renton: Very regrettably, we still have no clear information on the whereabouts of Mr. McCarthy or the identity of his kidnappers. We are doing everything possible to obtain news of him.

Cambodia (Discussions)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement following his discussions with His Excellency Son Sann.

Mr. Renton: When Mr. Son Sann, President of the Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF), called on 11 November, my right hon. and learned Friend and I reaffirmed our strong support for the principled stand of the Cambodian resistance against Vietnamese aggression. We pledged continued humanitarian assistance for the KPNLF and its non-Communist resistance partner led by Prince Sihanouk. We are also pledged to continue our contribution to the international relief effort for Cambodian refugees and our political support for all efforts aimed at securing a peaceful solution to the Cambodian conflict in line with past resolutions of the United Nations and the proposals of the international conference on Kampuchea. Mr. Son Sann expressed his gratitude for our support, and the resolve of the resistance to continue the struggle against the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia.

Mr. Denktash (Visit)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the current visit of Mr. Denktash to the United Kingdom and the staging of a Turkish-Cypriot national day celebration at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre in London implies any change in Her Majesty's Government's policy towards northern Cyprus.

Mrs. Chalker: No. We continue to recognise only the Republic of Cyprus headed by President Kyprianou. We deplored the Turkish Cypriot "unilateral declaration of independence" in 1983 and we hold to that view.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the status of the visit to London by Mr. Denktash; and if there are any plans for him to meet Government Ministers or officials.

Mrs. Chalker: Mr. Denktash's visit to the United Kingdom is private. There are no plans for any meetings between Mr. Denktash and Ministers or officials.

Visas

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contingency plans he has to provide a visa service in Calcutta if the officer falls ill or is on leave.

Mr. Eggar: There are two entry clearance officers in Calcutta.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what research he has carried out into the effect the 80 per cent. rise in visa costs will have on the ability of the poorest sections of the societies concerned to visit the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The £8 increase in visa fees for a visitor (from £12 to £20) represents only a very small proportion of total travel costs. The overseas entry clearance operation will still be substantially subsidised by the taxpayer.

United States (Protest)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the response of the United States Government to his formal protest of 26 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: There was no response.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make available in the Library the text of his formal protest to the Government of the United States of America of 26 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Such communications between Governments are confidential.

Falklands Fisheries

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list by nationality those fishing vessels sighted fishing in the Falkland Islands protection zone during the March 1986 squid fishing season.

Mrs. Chalker: A total of 367 fishing vessels (including trawlers, squid jiggers and reefers) were sighted in the FIPZ during March 1986 as follows:

	Number
USSR	46
Poland	58
German Democratic Republic	12
Bulgaria	7
Spain	41
Japan	88
Republic of Korea	34
Taiwan	51
Italy	3
Others (including flags of convenience)	27

Defence Equipment

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list his responsibilities in relation to policy and practice on the sale of defence equipment abroad.

Mr. Renton: All sales of defence equipment abroad are subject to strict licensing control and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is one of those Departments consulted as part of the licensing procedure. Our policy on the sale of defence equipment is to support such sales, whenever this is compatible with the United Kingdom's political, strategic and security interests. Each case is considered carefully on its merits. We do not supply arms to countries against which there is a mandatory arms embargo, or where we believe the items are likely to be used to violate human rights or to attack British forces or our allies. We also consider the possible effect any proposed sale might have on the stability of the region in question.

Diplomats (Offences)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the most recent numbers of offences involving United Kingdom based foreign diplomats notified to the police involving (a) traffic offences and (b) other criminal offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: So far this year we have been informed of 34 alleged serious offences by persons with immunity. 23 of these were traffic offences. (Serious in this context means offences falling into a category which could attract a penalty of six months imprisonment or more. These are substantially less than the figures for 1983 (60), 1984 (48) and 1985 (53).

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the number of value added tax refund claims under Customs and Excise notice No. 719 processed for the fiscal year 1985-1986.

Mr. Brooke: The number of claims under Customs and Excise Notice No. 719 (Refund of VAT to do-it-yourself builders) processed in the fiscal year 1985-86 was 9,437.

Charitable Giving

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his intention that the Government's own employees should be able to participate in tax-relieved payroll schemes for charitable giving.

Mr. Brooke: This matter is currently under discussion.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the real growth in gross domestic product since 1979 can be attributed to United Kingdom manufacturing industry.

Mr. MacGregor: Measured on an output basis, real gross domestic product in the third quarter of 1986 was 11·2 per cent. higher than in 1979 and 16·8 per cent. above the level of output recorded in the first half of 1981. Manufacturing output was 4·3 per cent. lower in the third quarter of 1986 than in 1979, but 12·8 per cent. higher than in the first half of 1981.

Housing (Taxation)

Mr. Raynsford asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in revenue at outturn prices in the current year of applying value added tax to the purchase cost of housing, at the standard rate.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 4 November 1986 at column 324.

Mr. Raynsford asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in revenue at outturn prices in the current year of withdrawing capital gains tax exemption from those owners of houses who sell properties which have been used as a primary residence.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Only a very tentative estimate is possible on an ex ante basis, of about £2,500 million in respect of 1985-86. This estimate assumes that there would be no relief for gains when disposal proceeds were applied to the purchase of another dwelling and makes no allowance for any consequential effects on the length of ownership, on the housing market generally or on the yield of other taxes. In practice house prices would almost certainly be affected and the number of disposals would go down. Both these effects could substantially reduce the yield.

Mr. Raynsford asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in revenue at outturn prices in the current year of tax relief on owner occupiers' mortgage interest and interest on other loans for house purchase and improvement being restricted to the standard rate of income tax including the revenue raised by virtue of people paying tax at the higher rate due to the withdrawal of mortgage interest relief.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Assuming no consequential changes to the distribution of mortgages outstanding, the direct revenue yield in a full year at 1986-87 levels from restricting relief to the basic rate is estimated at £320 million.

Systime plc

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the matters discussed in the course of informal discussions between United Kingdom and United States customs between 1982 and 1985, in relation to the United States investigations and fine of Systime plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: It is not the practice of United Kingdom Customs to disclose the content of discussions about operational matters with other agencies.

EC (News Services)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his reply of 17 November, whether the European Economic Community Commission challenge on the zero rating of news services for value added tax purposes includes newspapers and broadcasting licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Finance)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total sum which the European Economic Community plans to spend on all its activities in the current year; what estimate has been made of spending in 1987; what were the comparable figures for each of the years from 1980 to 1985; and if he will publish a table giving comparable information for each year of the amount spent by the European Economic Community, respectively, on the common agricultural policy and collectively on the storage, export and destruction of food surpluses.

Mr. Brooke: The 1986 Community budget provides for expenditure (payments appropriations) of 35,174 million ecu. The 1987 budget has not yet been adopted. The 1987 draft budget, which does not take account of amendments and modifications proposed by the European Parliament, provides for expenditure of 35,946 mecu. The figures for total planned expenditure in each of the years 1980 to 1985 are given in the table below. The table also sets out the information required on Community expenditure on the common agricultural policy and, collectively, on the public storage and export of products in structural surplus—cereals, sugar, milk products, beef and wine—and on withdrawals from the market of fish and fresh fruit and vegetables.

Patrol Boats

Mr. Kaufman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that new patrol boats intended for use by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise will be built in British yards.

Mr. Brooke: British shipyards have successfully met previous special customs requirements and this will be a factor when inviting applications to tender.

Personal Taxation

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will (a) list all the organisations which submitted a response to the Green Paper, "The Reform of Personal Taxation" and (b) state how many of these supported the proposal for a system of transferable tax allowances.

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 230]: The estimate of fees to be paid to outside consultants in the current year and amounts spent in each of the last two years is as follows:

	£ thousand
1984-85	1,217
1985-86	2,041
1986-87	2,250

Comparable figures for the years 1979-80 to 1981-82 are not available because of machinery of Government changes and the figures for 1982-83 and 1983-84 could only be given at disproportionate cost. The figure for the current year is a forecast outturn.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the total spending of all Government Departments and agencies on press and public relations this year; and what is was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 230]: The information requested in not held centrally.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 230]: The number of press and public relation staff employed in the Treasury on 1 November 1986 was 10. The figures for 1 January of each year were as follows:

	Numbers Employed
1982-83	11
1983-84	10
1984-85	11
1985-86	9

TRANSPORT

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the spending of his Department on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Moore: The estimated expenditure on management and computer consultancies for the current year is £1,790,000. Expenditure in 1984-85 and 1985-86 was £939,000 and £1,043,000 respectively. Information for earlier years could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Moore: The total spending by my Department on press and publicity for the years 1979-80 and each subsequent year is as follows:

1985-86	5,788,492
1986-87	*6,636,745

* Estimated.

Over 95 per cent. of this expenditure relates to road safety advertising.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Moore: Figures for expenditure on behalf of my Department by the Central Office of Information on newspaper and television advertising in the years 1979-84 were covered by answers which appeared in Hansard on 8 May 1984, c. 318 and those for 1984-85 financial year by reply in the edition which appeared 9 December 1985, c. 391.

Figures for radio advertising and other promotional literature are as follows:

Year	Radio £	Other Promotional Literature £
1979-80	62,126	71,500
1980-81	335,800	140,310
1981-82	5,750	113,800
1982-83	97,750	217,500
1983-84	22,117	505,608
1984-85	207,290	412,310

Figures for 1985-86 and estimated figures for 1986-87 are as follows:

1985-86	761,850	355,672	1,034,441	Nil
1986-87	496,000	530,000	480,000	Nil

Over the years 1979-86, about 95 per cent. of the expenditure relates to road safety advertising. Other significant subjects covered were mobility for the disabled, vehicle licensing, car sharing, exhibitions of new road schemes, bus deregulation and Channel Tunnel Bill procedures.

In addition, direct expenditure by my Department and the Department of the Environment for the years 1979-84 on statutory and classified press advertising was as follows:

Year	£
1979-80	500,262
1980-81	419,318
1981-82	605,299
1983-84	607,635
1983-84	873,207

These expenditures include spending by the Department of the Environment since, during that period, the Departments had a common information directorate. They do not include the cost of a limited amount of statutory advertising in the London Gazette.

Expenditure by my Department on statutory and classified press advertising for the succeeding years was as follows:

Year	£
1984-85	14,575
1985-86	30,573
1986-87	[1]30,000

[1] Estimated.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to motoring and Parliament to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 24 November to 28 November.

M11 (Services)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve motorway services on the M11.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We propose to develop a motorway service area at Birchanger, near Stansted at the junction of the M11 and A120. Trusthouse Forte has been selected by competitive tender to develop and operate the service area.

Dangerous Substances (Carriage)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the Dangerous Substances (Carriage by Road in Packages Etc.) Regulations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall answer this question shortly.

DEFENCE

Arms Sales

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has given any assistance in the past 12 months to any British company seeking to sell defence products to Iran.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department has given such assistance but only within the guidelines set out in the answer given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in reply to a question by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Etterick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) at column 454.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has refused to assist in the supply of spare parts for Chieftain tanks to any country to which the tanks themselves were supplied in the past by British manufacturers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Export licences for some Chieftain tank spare parts have not been given. This has been in compliance with Government policy.

Military Operations and Counter-terrorism (Conference)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the military officers who (a) were invited to attend, (b) attended and (c) spoke at the international working conference on special military operations and counter-terrorism held on 3 and 4 November in London;

(2) if he will list the subjects on which military officers spoke during the international working conference on special military operations and counter-terrorism held on 3 and 4 November in London.

Mr. Freeman: The conference to which the hon. Member refers was organised by the Defence and Foreign Affairs magazine and the International Strategic Studies Association, and I am not, therefore, aware of the list of those invited to attend. I understand that, in the event, one United Kingdom military officer attended and spoke in general terms on certain aspects of special operations.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the cost to public funds of the participation of military officers who attended the international working conference on special military operations and counter-terrorism on 3 and 4 November;

(2) what was the cost to public funds of holding the international working conference on special military operations and counter-terrorism at the Honourable Artillery Company, Armoury House, City Road, London on 3 and 4 November.

Mr. Freeman: No cost of public funds was involved in holding the conference to which the hon. Member refers, beyond the expenses of the United Kingdom military officer who attended the conference. These amounted to about £45.

Messrs. Robert Gaunt and David Walker

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Robert Gaunt or David Walker have been employed as consultants in any capacity by Her Majesty's Government since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: On the basis of the information currently available to me I am not aware of any specific MOD contract with either of these gentlemen as consultants. If the hon. Member wishes to provide further information I will carry out a further check and write to him.

Defence and Foreign Affairs Group

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions since 1979 on which military officers or civil servants have been invited to or have attended conferences organised by either or both of the Defence and Foreign Affairs Group and the International Strategic Studies Association.

Mr. Freeman: A serving officer attended a conference held jointly by Defence and Foreign Affairs and the International Strategic Studies Association in London on 3-4 November. Information on official attendance at previous conferences held by Defence and Foreign Affairs and the International Strategic Studies Association is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government pay any subscription or grant to the Defence and Foreign Affairs Group or the International Strategic Studies Association.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence pays no grant to either the International Strategic Studies Association or Defence and Foreign Affairs. The Ministry of Defence library does, however, subscribe to various publications produced by the Defence and Foreign Affairs group.

Wintex '87

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Wintex '87 will involve local authorities in civil defence planning at (a) the county level and (b) district level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.
No.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the regional emergency committees will be convened during Wintex '87; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: I have been asked to reply.
The Government plan to activate regional emergency committees during Wintex '87 next March.

Defence Scientific Advisory Council

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many academics or scientists from universities or other institutions of higher education sit on the Defence Scientific Advisory Council.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 224]: The Defence Scientific Advisory Council consists of an independent chairman, not more than 19 independent members and eight official members. Of the independent members, there are currently 12 from universities or higher education establishments.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Drug Abuse

79. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what future plans he has to continue to make young people aware of the dangers of drug abuse.

Mrs. Currie: During the course of the year we have been continuing and developing the campaign of education and information about drugs which we launched in 1985. This year's campaign involves:

— advertisements on television, radio and in the press (focusing both on young people and their parents);
— the provision of leaflets for parents, professionals and others;
— a video package for use with 12-15 year olds which we have made available free of charge to all secondary schools in England and Wales.

We shall shortly be evaluating the effects of this year's campaign of education and information and will consider how best further to develop the campaign in the light of the evaluation.

In addition, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, is taking a range of initiatives to improve drugs education given in schools.

AIDS

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) on 28 October 1986 at column 123.

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will outline the steps he proposes to take to combat acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Newton: A full account will be given of the Government's plans in the debate on AIDS on 21 November.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidelines have been issued to ambulance personnel as regards dealing with acquired immune deficiency syndrome and suspected acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Guidelines have been issued to health authorities which have responsibility for the day-to-day operational management of ambulance services. In addition, officials have also specifically advised regional health authority ambulance officers through the Secretary of their uni-disciplinary group. Guidance was issued to health authorities in January 1985 (Circular HC(85)2) in the form of interim guidelines by my right hon. Friend's advisory committee on dangerous pathogens. Those guidelines contained advice on measures which should be taken to safeguard the health and safety of people who, because of their work, come into direct contact with patients who might be suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome. Revised guidelines were issued to health authorities in June 1986 (Circular HN(86)20). Copies of both circulars are in the Library.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those hospitals and clinics in England and Wales which have in-patient facilities for the treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome victims.

Mr. Newton: The wide spectrum of illnesses associated with the infection can be treated in normal district general hospital in-patient and out-patient facilities. Advice has been issued to all health authorities about the appropriate precautions to be taken in dealing with AIDS cases.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, when his Department first tested blood and blood products from the United States for HIV and when his Department first issued advice to (a) doctors and (b) health authorities about acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: Supplies of whole blood are not imported since the United Kingdom is self-sufficient; only certain blood products such as factor VIII are imported.

A suitable test for antibodies to HIV was developed during 1985. Since the beginning of 1986 it has been a licensing requirement that all imported factor VIII should be made from individually tested plasma donations. At the same time, as part of this licensing procedure, the National Institute of Biological Standards and Control started testing samples of each batch of imported factor VIII for HIV antibodies.

The Department first issued specific guidance documents on AIDS to health authorities in January 1985 and to all doctors in May 1985.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he will list those hospitals offering blood tests for HIV, giving the number of people tested; and how many proved positive.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: HIV antibody tests are available in NHS genito-urinary medicine clinics of which there are 190 in England and Wales. Tests are also available through general practitioners and in the private sector. Laboratories testing the blood samples report only positive test results to the Communicable Disease Surveillance centre. At the end of October 1986, 3,590 positive test results had been reported.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Government first financed research into the causes and treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: The Medical Research Council, which receives grant in aid from the Science Vote of the Department of Education and Science, is responsible for co-ordinating research on AIDS in the United Kingdom. I understand that the first special project grant was awarded in 1983.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the British Government's contacts with the World Health Organisation or other Governments on the subject of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986 c. 78]: The Government have taken an active part in discussions on AIDS at the WHO European regional committee meetings in 1985 and 1986 and at the World Health assembly this year.

They have also participated in WHO expert committees on AIDS and have been involved in discussions on the WHO AIDS programme. The Government have pledged £250,000 to the programme. There was also discussion of the matter at the recent meeting of Commonwealth Health Ministers.

British Embassies and High Commissions generally have been asked to report on major developments in respect of AIDS.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when his Department first became aware of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(2) when his Department first became aware that acquired immune deficiency syndrome was a sexually transmitted disease.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: First reports about the disease were received from America in 1981 and the first case of AIDS in the United Kingdom was diagnosed at the end of that year. The possibility that AIDS could be sexually transmitted was suggested at that time. Following the isolation of the causative virus in America and France during 1983, it was confirmed that the condition was caused by an infection which was blood borne and also sexually transmissible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department first became aware that acquired immune deficiency syndrome could be transmitted through blood and blood products.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: We became aware in 1982 of reports from the United States of America that haemophiliacs were contracting AIDS. Although the mechanism of infection was not known it was presumed that it had been transmitted through the use of blood products such as factor VIII. Evidence that the AIDS infection could also be transmitted by blood transfusion emerged from the United States of America in 1983.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which health authorities are providing resources for the treatment or study of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986 c. 78]: All districts are expected to provide appropriate treatment for sick people in their areas, including AIDS cases where such exist. Authorities have been asked to provide by the end of December detailed action plans covering education, counselling, testing and treatment.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of people suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome currently being treated in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: People suffering from AIDS may develop a number of symptoms, some of which may require regular or intermittent in-patient treatment while others may receive NHS treatment as out-patients. Records are not kept centrally of the number of in-patients being treated at any one time.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the likely extent of acquired immune deficiency syndrome over the next five years;

(2) what additional resources will be required by the hospitals service to cope with his estimate of the likely incidence of acquired immune deficiency syndrome over the next five years.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 78]: The latest published predictions by the Communicable Disease Surveillance centre estimate that in the United Kingdom there will be 550 new cases of AIDS diagnosed in 1986, 1,300 in 1987 and 3,000 in 1988. Inevitably these estimates involve a significant degree of uncertainty. There are no published predictions for the United Kingdom beyond 1988. Nor is it at present possible to make worthwhile estimates of the costs of hospital or other treatment for AIDS cases over the next five years.

Benefits

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are currently in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit and (b) contributory benefit from the Wandsworth offices of his Department at Irene house, Arndale house and Parkgate road; and what were the comparable figures for 31 December 1984 and 31 December 1985.

Mr. Lyell: The number of people receiving supplementary benefit, from the Department's offices at Irene house, Arndale house and Parkgate road at 13 August 1986, the latest figures available, and at 12 December 1984 and 11 December 1985 is:

	12 December 1984	11 December 1985	26 August 1986
Irene House (Balham ILO)	12,942	13,243	13,572
Arndale House (Wandsworth ILO)	9,172	9,628	10,390
Parkgate Road (Battersea ILO)	13,567	13,839	14,341

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

All contributory benefit work for Irene house and Parkgate road offices is dealt with centrally and information about how many people are in receipt of contributory benefits in each local office area is not available.

Information about people claiming sickness and invalidity benefit, maternity allowance and severe disablement allowance from Arndale house at 21 October 1986, the latest figures available, and at 18 December 1984 and 17 December 1985 were as follows:

	18 December 1984	17 December 1985	21 October 1986
Sickness and Invalidity Benefit	1,349	1,700	1,441
Maternity Allowance	203	307	231
Severe Disablement Allowance	308	341	410

Hyperactive Children's Support Group

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will make financial resources available to the hyperactive children's support group.

Mrs. Currie: We have no plans to do so.

There is as yet no consensus of medical opinion on either the causes, or the most appropriate treatment, of hyperactivity in children. It would therefore be wrong for the Department to identify itself with the exclusively dietary theories advocated by the hyperactive children's support group, as other factors may well be at work.

Severe Weather Payments

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to lay regulations relating to exceptionally severe weather payments.

Mr. Major: We have today laid before Parliament the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Amendment Regulations 1986 which provide for a new system of exceptionally cold weather payments to take effect from 11 December 1986. These payments are in addition to the help given for heating through the main supplementary benefit scale rates and the weekly heating addition—payable automatically to supplementary benefit householders over the age of 65—which amounted to some £400 million in 1984-85.

The new regulations follow consultation with the Social Security Advisory Committee on proposals submitted to it in August. The committee's report on the proposals together with the Secretary of State's response has also been laid before Parliament today.

The committee support the main elements of the proposals as a significant improvement on the previous schemes for exceptionally severe weather payments in terms of simplicity, comprehensibility and certainly of payment.

The regulations provide for a single payment of £5 for each week of exceptionally cold weather. A week will be declared exceptionally cold when the average temperature recorded over a seven-day period Monday to Sunday—is minus 1·5C or less. Decisions will be taken on the basis of data collected by the Meteorological Office in respect of 63 weather stations in Great Britain to which local office areas will be linked.

Supplementary benefit householders will be eligible for help where there is a member of the family who is aged 65 or over, chronically sick or disabled, or under age two. As with other single payments, claimants will not be eligible for help if they have savings over £500.

In the light of particular concerns expressed by the committee, the time limit for claiming has been extended to 13 weeks and the regulations make clear that one claim will normally be valid for continuous periods of exceptionally cold weather.

The Government are grateful to the committee for its consideration of the proposals and welcome its general endorsement.

The regulations also include a minor technical amendment confirming that single payments for rent in advance are not available for people taking up board and lodging. The social security advisory committee agreed not to have this matter referred to it.

Supplementary Benefit (Scotland)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown for (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Scotland as a whole, using low income tables for 1979 and 1983, of the numbers of people who fall below the supplementary benefit level, who are on supplementary benefit and up to 140 per cent. of supplementary benefit broken down by economic status and family types, showing what proportion each group makes up of the population of Greenock and Port Glasgow, Strathclyde Region and Scotland.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 30 October, columns 242-246.

I regret that information for Greenock and Port Glasgow, the Strathclyde region and Scotland as a whole, classified by economic status and family types, cannot be provided on a statistically reliable basis.

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list (a) local authorities who have sold residential care homes, as defined by the Registered Homes Act 1984, since 1979, (b) the number of residential care homes sold by each authority since 1979 and (c) the number of residential care homes sold by local authorities, for each year, since 1979;

(2) if he will list (a) the number of places lost by the sale of local authority care homes, for each year since 1979, (b) the number of places lost by the sale of local authority care homes by each authority since 1979 and (c) the amount of revenue generated by the sale of local authority residential care homes, for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Currie: The information is not available centrally in the form requested, but between 31 March 1979 and 31 March 1985 the number of local authority homes, including staffed hostels for the mentally disordered, increased from 3,751 to 4,389 and the number of places from 128,565 to 135,595.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many residential care homes, dealing wholly or mainly with (a) the elderly, (b) the mentally ill and (c) drug/alcohol dependants have registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984;

(2) if he will publish (a) the numbers of residential care homes which have been registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984, to date, (b) the number of places now available in residential care homes registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984, (c) an estimate of the number of residential care homes with fewer than four paying occupants and (d) the number of residential care homes which have registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984, broken down by region, as defined by regional health authority boundaries.

Mrs. Currie: Full information is not available in the form requested. The table gives details of the latest information collected centrally; it relates to registered homes within local authority boundaries grouped according to the most appropriate health region. Information is not available centrally on homes with fewer than four residents which are not required to register.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the annual aggregate figure for the amount of benefit being paid to those in residential care homes; and how many people are living in homes run by: (a) private organistions, (b) voluntary organisations and (c) local authorities.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Drug/Alcohol Abuse Clinics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities or health authorities (a) run centres for the treatment of drug/alcohol abuse, listing those authorities by name, (b) have plans to open new centres, or expand existing centres, for the treatment of drug/alcohol abuse, listing those authorities by name and (c) have closed centres for the treatment of drug/alcohol abuse since 1983, listing those authorities by name.

Mrs. Currie: The BBC/SCODA directory "Drug Problems — Where to Get Help", of which there is a copy in the Library, lists services for the treatment of drug misusers provided by the statutory, voluntary and private sectors by county. Alcohol Concern's directory "Alcohol Services", available from Alcohol Concern, 305 Grays Inn road, London WC1 8QF, lists services for problem drinkers in a similar way.

All regional health authorities have plans to expand services for drug misusers, but comprehensive information on the plans of individual districts is not available centrally nor is information or plans to expand services for problem drinkers. Information on closures of centres for drug misusers or problem drinkers is not held centrally.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims are at present awaiting processing by the invalid care allowance unit; and what steps are being taken to expedite those claims.

Mr. Major: At 14 November 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, 76,000 claims were outstanding, of which 66,000 were from married women who were made eligible for ICA in July by the Social Security Act 1986. The Department has set up a new unit at Preston and engaged an extra 320 staff to deal with the claims. Every effort is being made to clear the current backlog of claims as quickly as possible. We expect the majority of these to be cleared by early in the new year.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list information available to him on the European Economic Community countries in which widows are eligible to claim invalid care allowance in respect of members of their family.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom is the only European Community country which provides an invalid care allowance, as distinct from attendance allowance paid to the invalid person. Widows are eligible to claim invalid care allowance in the United Kingdom, although receipt of the allowance may reduce other social security benefits in payment, including widows' benefits.

Warnock Report

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has instigated consultations with the medical profession concerning legislative implications of the recommendations contained in the Warnock report.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Job Training Programme

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will be eligible for free prescriptions whilst on the scheme.

Mr. Major: Participants in the job training scheme receiving housing benefit supplement will be entitled to free prescriptions in in the same way as recipients of supplementary benefit. Other participants will be able to claim refunds on the ground of low income and if they were entitled to receive to refunds before going on the course they will continue to receive them so long as their circumstances remain unchanged.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will be eligible for free schools meals for their families whilst on the scheme;

(2) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will still be eligible for additional benefits such as single payments.

Mr. Major: Participants in the job training scheme receiving housing benefit supplement will be entitled to free school meals and to single payments in the same way as recipients of supplementary benefit. Other trainees will have no entitlement to single payments under supplementary benefit rules nor is there a statutory obligation on local authorities to provide free school meals on the ground of low income, although most do. However, people on the scheme found to have lost entitlement to either of these benefits will be compensated by additions to the training allowance.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will still be eligible for diet additions whilst on the scheme;

(2) if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will still be eligible for heating allowances whilst on the scheme;

(3) if he will make a statement setting out the benefit entitlement position of those accepting places on the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme begun in selected areas.

Mr. Major: Instead of receiving benefit, a participant in the new job training scheme will receive a training allowance which will be equal to the total amount of unemployment and/or supplementary benefit in payment immediately before the course started. This will include any dietary and heating additions paid as part of the supplementary benefit. The training allowance will be increased during the course if the person's benefit would have been increased on a change of circumstances, but it will not be decreased if there is a change of circumstances that would have reduced or eliminated the benefit had he remained unemployed.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee will still be eligible for certificated housing benefit whilst on the scheme.

Mr. Major: Participants in the job training scheme will not be entitled to supplementary benefit and certificated housing benefit ceases automatically when supplementary benefit stops. However, the trainees will be entitled to standard housing benefit, topped up where appropriate by housing benefit supplement, so that they will be no worse off while on the scheme.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if those 20 long-term unemployed claimants who were invited to participate in the new Manpower Services Commission's funded job training programme during interviews held in Dundee who work on fuel direct schemes will still be assisted.

Mr. Major: As participants in the job training scheme will receive a training allowance instead of supplementary benefit, payments under the fuel direct schemes will no longer be possible. The training allowance will include any fuel costs previously deducted from supplementary benefit and the trainees will assume full responsibility for paying their own fuel bills, as would be the case if supplementary benefit had stopped for any other reason.

Brain Drain

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates to be the numbers involved in the brain drain from Great Britain each year since 1960.

Mrs. Currie: Our understanding of the term "brain drain" is the numbers of people in management and professional groups who have emigrated.

Information on the brain drain is not directly available from the statistics compiled by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. However, the movement of persons in the professional and managerial occupational category are shown in the table. It should be noted that some emigrants will have previously entered the United Kingdom from abroad and some will eventually return to the United Kingdom; and conversely for immigrants.

Drugs (Product Identification)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by what date the United Kingdom will be obliged to conform to EEC Directive No. 85/374 on product identification in respect of prescribed generic drugs and medical supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have been asked to reply.

EC Directive 85/374 relates to the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning liability for defective products, including drugs and medical supplies. Member states are obliged to implement the directive not later than three years from the date of notification of the directive—that is, by 30 July 1988.

The Consumer Protection Bill, which includes provisions to implement this directive, was introduced into another place on 19 November. Hon. Members will have ample time to consider those provisions in due course.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of people unemployed in each district ward of Dundee and the number of such people who have been unemployed for one year or more.

Mr. Lang: As at 10 July 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of people unemployed in each district ward of Dundee and the number of those who have been unemployed for one year or more is shown in the table. This information is available in the Library.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the average number and percentage rate of unemployed in each of the parliamentary constituencies within Tayside region.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the precise form requested. At 9 October 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in each parliamentary constituency within Tayside region is shown in the table below. This information is available in the Library. Unemployment percentage rates are not calculated for parliamentary constituencies but for Tayside region as a whole the unemployment rate on the same date was 14·5 per cent.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the average number of registered job vacancies in Dundee each month this year.

Mr. Lang: The total number of vacancies notified to the Dundee jobcentre in each month of 1986 to date is shown in the table below. This information is available in the Library. The number of vacancies notified to jobcentres nationally is estimated to be only one-third of existing vacancies overall.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the latest available data on the number of nurses unemployed in Dundee and Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The only recent source of this information is the 1985 labour force survey, but the sample size is too small for a reliable estimate to be prepared for this group, either in Dundee or in Scotland.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the number of construction workers who are unemployed in Dundee and Scotland; and if he will break down these figures by trade.

Mr. Lang: The most recent information on unemployed construction workers relates to spring 1985, and comes from the labour force survey. From this source, the Department of Employment estimate at 36,000 the number of people looking for work in Scotland during the week prior to the survey, whose last job was in the construction industry and who had been unemployed for less than three years. Sample sizes are too small to provide reliable estimates for Dundee, or by trade.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current age distribution of those unemployed in Dundee for one year or over; and if he will give each age group total as a percentage of the total number of those unemployed for one year or more.

Mr. Lang: At 10 July 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in the city of Dundee local authority district who had been unemployed for one year or more by age group and the percentage each group represented of the total unemployed for one year or more is shown in the table below. High Court Judiciary, Glasgow

Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place a copy of scheme 1 and 2 and any other schemes for the High Court judiciary in Glasgow in the Library.

Mr. Rifkind: Reports on the three schemes examined have been placed in the Library.

Torness (Emergency Plan)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ensure that a copy of the Torness site emergency plan is placed in the Library before the fuelling of the reactor at Torness has been completed.

Mr. Lang: The production of the Torness emergency plan is a matter for the South of Scotland Electricity Board (SSEB), subject to the approval of Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate (NII) under the terms of the licensing conditions, as is the distribution of the plan. The plan is approved by the NII in section as the commissioning of the plant progresses and fuelling is only a part of the commissioning process. The board has undertaken to place a copy of the plan in the Library as soon as it has been fully approved by the NII.

Broadleaf Woodland Grant

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the applications for broadleaf woodland grant which have been approved by the Forestry Commission in Scotland to the end of September, broken down to include totals of ancient semi-natural woodland sites, other bare land, and the number of hectares of each tree species planted with grant aid within these categories for all three Scottish conservancies.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Forestry

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the area of land within the flow country of Sutherland and Caithness which is unlikely to be released from agriculture for forestry purposes.

Mr. John MacKay: Agreement to the transfer of agricultural land for forestry planting in Scotland is limited to the procedures for dealing with grant applications under the Forestry Commission's forestry grant schemes. Each application is considered by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland against the criteria announced by my right hon. and learned Friend in March of this year. It is not possible to give an overall estimate of the area of land within the flow country in respect of which agreement might be given or withheld.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the dates of the last two meetings between the Forestry Commission and, respectively, the Scottish Development Department, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds to discuss the future pattern of land use in the flow country.

Mr. John MacKay: The last two meetings at headquarters level between the Forestry Commission and the bodies named, for the purpose of discussing land use in the flow country, were as follows:

Scottish Development Department and Nature Conservancy Council — 13 August and 22 October 1986.

Royal Society for the Protection of Birds — 27 September 1985 and 26 June 1986.

Forestry Grant Aid

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the Forestry Commission's policy towards future applications for forestry grant aid on sites of special scientific interest in the flow country of Sutherland and Caithness.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission's policy on such applications will accord with paragraph 18 of the code of guidance for sites of special scientific interest as approved by Parliament.

Pine Beauty Moth

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the area of forestry plantations in Scotland which has been killed by pine beauty moth; and if he will list the names of the plantations affected, their size, their dates of planting and the dates of the attack leading to the plantation death in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: The total area of forestry plantations killed by pine beauty moth is estimated at 650 hectares — 0·07 per cent. of the total conifer area in Scotland. The other information requested is as follows:

Plantation name	Area killed (hectares)	Period when planted	Year of attack
Rimsdale	180	1958-75	1976-77
Strathy	60	1955-67	1977
North Dalchork	50	1959-72	1984
Polliehill[1]	170	1967-73	1984-85
Strathrannoch	30	1956-57	1978
Annabaglish	50	1966 and 1969	1978
Poulary	40	1966-69	1986
	580

[1] Private estate.

In addition to the areas listed in the above table, there have been a number of small, scattered attacks which have resulted in the death of an estimated 70 hectares of plantations.

Windthrow

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the dates and locations of the occurrence of catastrophic windthrow events in British forestry plantations since 1945, giving the area affected in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: There have been three major gales since 1945 that have caused extensive damage to forests. These occurred in January 1953 in north east Scotland, in January 1968 in central Scotland and in January 1976 in mid Wales, the midlands and East Anglia.

As the severity and pattern of damage varied greatly, statistics were kept on the basis of the volumes of windthrown timber, rather than on the area of forest affected.

AIDS

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those hospitals and clinics in Scotland which have in-patient facilities for treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers.

Mr. John MacKay: There are infectious diseases units in Edinburgh and Glasgow which have had experience in treating patients with AIDS, but the wide spectrum of illnesses associated with this disease can also be treated in normal hospital in-patient and out-patient departments.

Proctoscopes

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has recently issued guide lines to health centres concerning the sterilisation of proctoscopes or the use of disposable proctoscopes.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend does not issue guidance on detailed clinical matters of this nature; but I understand that it is normal practice to use sterile items for the internal examination of patients.

Highland Regional Council

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, following his Department's recent discussions with Highland regional council, he will arrange for enhanced capital allocations to be made available for social work projects in the region.

Mr. John Mackay: Highland regional council's provisional capital allocations for 1987-88 and future years, along with those of the other regional and islands councils in Scotland, will be reviewed early in the new year in the light of the resources available for social work building programmes. It would be inappropriate to speculate on the outcome.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the amount of fire-fighting equipment which is located within Peterhead prison; if there are any plans to increase it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The fire-fighting equipment available within Peterhead prison is listed below. Such equipment is intended to enable limited outbreaks of fire to be contained, where possible, until the fire service is able to attend. There are no plans to increase the provision of fire-fighting equipment.

	Number
Water/gas fire extinguishers (two gallons)	84
BCF fire extinguishers	55
Foam fire extinguishers	36
CO2 fire extinguishers	10
Hoses:
Discharge	35
Suction	4
Fire pumps	2
Hose reels	5

Prison Officers (Training)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to seek to increase the amount of training which prison officers receive in firefighting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The primary responsibility for fighting fires rests with the fire brigades. Prison officers are trained in good practice in the event of an alarm being raised, and if possible, containing the outbreak until the arrival of the fire brigade. There are no plans to extend training in fire-fighting.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Chernobyl

Mr. Terlezki asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what type of (a) agricultural products, (b) dairy products and (c) tinned food and fish the United Kingdom has been importing from the Soviet Union since the Chernobyl catastrophe in the Ukraine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. That which is available is as follows:

United Kingdom imports of food, beverages and other agricultural products from the Soviet Union.

	Tonnes
Meat and meat preparations	17
Fish and fish preparations	2,874
Fruit and vegetables	154

Paté de Fois Gras

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received for a ban to be imposed on the import of paté de fois gras; whether he has made a decision about such a proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: A number of organisations and individuals have called for a ban on the import of paté de fois gras into the United Kingdom. My Department has no powers to impose such a ban which, in any case, I am advised would contravene the Treaty of Rome.

Sows

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any proposals to prohibit or reduce the use of dry sow stalls or girth straps and chains which severely restrict movement of pregnant sows; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Farm Animal Welfare council has recently begun a review of pig production systems including dry sow stalls, tether stalls and farrowing crates, and will be considering whether some welfare aspects should be made the subject of regulations. I understand that the council hopes to make proposals on this next year and I look forward to receiving them. Meanwhile I have no plans to prohibit or reduce the use of the systems mentioned.

Nuclear Accidents (Food Production)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what preparation and planning has been made, in the event of a nuclear accident, for food production in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has detailed contingency plans to assess the availability and safety of food supplies following a nuclear accident, including, if necessary, statutory restrictions for the protection of public health. If appropriate, arrangements would be made for alternative food supplies to be made available.

Forestry Grant Applications

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what agreements have been reached regarding consultations with conservation organisations over forestry grant applications in environmentally sensitive areas.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Arrangements have been agreed with the Countryside Commission and the Countryside Commission for Scotland for consulting them about forestry proposals arising in environmentally sensitive areas. Discussions with the Nature Conservancy Council are still in progress.

Beef, Butter and Cheese

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average consumption of beef, butter and cheese per head of the population in the most recent monthly period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures five years previously.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The average household consumption per person in Great Britain of beef, butter and cheese in September 1986 and September 1981 were as follows:

Average household consumption of beef, butter and cheese in Great Britain—ounces per person per week

	September 1986	September 1981
Beef[1]	7·79	7·38
Butter	1·97	3·43
Cheese	4·06	3·93

[1] Carcase meat. Excludes the beef content of meat products.
Source: National Food Survey.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposal he has advanced to the European Economic Community Commission for adjustments in the green pound rate applicable to beef; whether any other agricultural produce is affected by his proposal; what effect his proposal is estimated to have in percentage terms on the income to farmers producing beef, and in terms of pence per pound to the retail price of beef.

Mr. Gummer: On 22 September, I asked the Commission to propose green pound devaluations sufficient to reduce the difference between United Kingdom green and market rates by six percentage points for beef and by two percentage points for other livestock products. If agreed, the devaluation for beef would increase support prices by about 5·1 per cent. The effect on producers' returns and on retail prices would depend on the extent to which market prices respond.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current rates of import levy applicable to beef, butter and cheese, expressed in terms of pence per pound; and what special rates apply to imports of butter and cheese from New Zealand.

Mr. Gummer: The information is set out in the table.

Import levy applicable in the United Kingdom on 17 November 1986

Commodity	Pence per lb Levy applicable in United Kingdom[2]
Beef[1]	57·9
Butter
full rate of levy (82% fat content)	78·6
New Zealand (special rate) (80% fat content)	7·8
Cheese (Cheddar)
full rate of levy	67·0
New Zealand (special rate)	4·3

[1] The rates of levy vary according to tariff heading and country of origin. The rate quoted is for carcase beef (tariff heading 02.01 A II a1) from third countries other than Austria, Switzerland or Sweden. In practice, most beef imports from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced rates of levy.
[2] Net of MCA.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 17 November, Official Report, column 16, what are the current monetary compensation amounts payable to or by traders in the United Kingdom expressed as pence per pound, for the export of beef purchased under Regulation 2670/85 and for the export of butter under Regulation 1812/86; and what, in consequence, are the net prices, after payment of export refund and monetary compensation amount, at which the various categories of beef and butter specified in the answer become available to traders exporting under these regulations.

Mr. Gummer: Regulation 2670/85:

The monetary compensatory amounts (MCAs) applicable in the week commencing 17 November and the prices ex-United Kingdom after payment of an export refund, adjusted by MCA for the various categories of beef available in the United Kingdom under this sale are as follows:

	MCA (pence/lb)	Selling price adjusted for export refunds and MCA (pence/lb)
Bone-in-beef
Forequarters	13	20
Hindquarters	21	36
Boneless beef
Higher value cuts eligible for export refunds	21	99
Lower value cuts not eligible for export refund[1]	—	—
Lower value cuts not eligible for export refund	4	18

[1] Not available in United Kingdom under this sale.

Regulation 1812/86

This regulation covers the sale of beef for export to Brazil and prices are set by tender. United Kingdom beef sold under the regulation was sold at 12·5 p/lb. Export refunds are not available for export to Brazil but an MCA charge of 3·4 p/lb would be payable on exports taking place in the week commencing 17 November. It may be that my hon. Friend, in referring to the export of butter under regulation 1812/86, was seeking details of butter exports under regulation 765/86.

Regulation 765/86

The MCAs payable by traders in the week commencing 17 November under this regulation are as follows:

	Pence/lb
Butter with fat content of 80 per cent.	12·5
Butter with fat content of 82 per cent.	13

The sale price of the butter itself is set by competitive tender. There have been no recent bids for 80 per cent. fat butter, the only category available from intervention in the United Kingdom. But on the basis of the latest price accepted for for 82 per cent. butter, the corresponding net price, taking account of current MCAs and export refunds, would be approximately 10p per lb. This figure does not take account of transport and other costs.

Food and Wine

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has received from the European Economic Community of the amount which is spent each week on the storage, export and destruction, respectively, of food and wine; and what additional sums, per week, are spent by member states on these areas of spending.

Mr. Gummer: The 1986 Community budget provides for expenditure of 10,179 mecu (196 mecu per week) on public intervention storage, export refunds and withdrawals of fresh fruit and vegetables and fish. In some circumstances withdrawn produce finds no end use and may be assumed to be spoilt or wasted, although the relevant expenditure is not identified separately in the available statistics.

Details of related United Kingdom expenditure are contained in the supply estimates and appropriation accounts of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce. Equivalent information for other member states is not available.

Green Pound

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the implications for United Kingdom and Community public expenditure if the proposal by Her Majesty's Government for alterations in the green pound rate is accepted by the European Economic Community.

Mr. Gummer: The proposal that I made to the Commission in September for green rate devaluations could, depending on future circumstances, increase United Kingdom public expenditure by about £50 million and Community expenditure by about 35 mecu in a full year.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 252]: The budget for total administration expenditure on press liaison, information policy and technical visual aids for 1986-87 is £2·6 million. The expenditure for the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 was £2·1 million and £2·3 million respectively. Annual expenditure for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986 c. 252]: My Department has spent the following sums on newspaper advertising and promotional literature during the years in question.

Year	Newspaper advertising £	Promotional literature £
1979-80	90,694	17,250
1980-81	95,839	26,676
1981-82	63,303	30,350
1982-83	96,730	87,900
1983-84	103,021	68,184
1984-85	98,532	146,501
1985-86	110,823	125,890

It is estimated that expenditure for 1986-87 will be £167,209 on newspaper advertising and £228,880 on promotional literature. During the years in question my Department spent no money on television or radio advertising.

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many press and public relations staff are employed in his Department; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986 c. 25]: The total number of press and public relations staff employed by my Department is as follows. The number of staff in information officer grades is included in the total.

Year	Total Number employed	Number of Information Officers
1979-80	107	19

Agriculture Act 1985

Mr. Evans asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implementation and consequences to date of the Agriculture Act 1985.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 2]: Section 1 of the Agriculture Act 1986, which enables Ministers to charge for the provision of goods and services came into force on 25 September; it is already open both to individuals and to outside organisations to commission research and pay for a number of standard laboratory and professional services, but other advice continues to be available free of charge pending the introduction in 1987 of a wide range of advisory services at varying prices. The existing arrangements for the provision of free advice on conservation, diversification, animal welfare and pollution avoidance will continue.

With regard to section 2 of the Act, I shall be consulting interested parties in the new year with a view to recovering the costs of enforcing the seeds regulations from 1 August 1987.

Section 3 of the Act also provides power to charge for plant health export certification and import licensing work. Details of the proposed charges have now been published and the response is being assessed.

Sections 4 and 5 of the Act extend the functions of the Home-Grown Cereals Authority to cover the production and marketing of cereals, widening in particular the authority's powers to conduct or commission research. The levy on cereals marketed, which provides part of the income of the authority has been raised to 20p per tonne for 1986-87 to meet increases in expenditure agreed with the main sectors of the cereals industry. The rates of contribution to levy income are to be changed under a new levy scheme before the start of the 1987 marketing year.

Section 7 of the Act provides scope to increase the number of Meat and Livestock Commission commissioners, potentially to 15. My colleagues and I have made appointments which give effect to the understanding that direct levy payers should each be represented by four commissioners. The possibility of making two further appointments in the future will be kept under review. Section 7 also introduces the concept whereby different sectors of the livestock and livestock products industry may pay levy in different proportions. The NFU has recently consulted its members recommending proposals for a producer only funded levy for species promotion and is in discussion with the MLC over how this shall be given effect in due course.

It is expected that the Eggs Authority will be abolished at the end of 1986 under section 9 of the Act.

Sections 13-16 and the related schedules provide for tenants to receive compensation from their landlord at the end of their tenancy in recognition of their efforts in obtaining milk quota attaching to that particular holding. The arrangements were brought into effect on 25 September 1986 by implementation in England and Wales of the Agriculture Act 1986 (Commencement) (No. 1) Order 1986, Statutory Instrument 1986 No. 1484 (C 50) and the Milk Quota (Calculation of Standard Quota) Order 1986, Statutory Instrument 1986 No. 1530.

Implementation in Scotland was by means of the Agriculture Act 1986 (Commencement) (No. 2) (Scotland) Order 1986, Statutory Instrument 1986 No. 1485 (C 51) (S 117) and the Milk Quota (Calculation of Standard Quota) (Scotland) Order 1986 No. 1475 (S 116).

Section 17 of the Act requires Agriculture Ministers to have regard to, and endeavour to achieve, a reasonable balance between agricultural, conservation and other interests in the countryside. My colleagues and I will continue to be guided by the principles enshrined in this provision.

Under section 18 of the Act, I shall lay orders designating environmentally sensitive areas before Parliament shortly.

Dairy Inspections

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will explain in detail how the proposed charge of £90 is arrived at for a single visit by a dairy inspector; and what representations he has received from the Milk Marketing Board on this matter.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 252]: The object of charging for milk and dairies work is to cover all the costs which the Ministry incurs in administering the milk and dairies regulations. These costs currently total approximately £2·2 million a year.

The proposed charge of £90 therefore covers more than the cost of the actual farm visit. It covers the dairy husbandry officer's travelling time, the cost of travel and time spent on preparatory and follow-up work in the office. It also covers indirect costs such as the significant time which the Ministry's administrative and clerical staff devote to this work, postal and telephone costs, and an appropriate proportion of accommodation costs and other overheads. Because there will be no charge for short follow-up visits the costs associated with these visits are also included in the proposed charge for a routine visit. All these costs have been carefully calculated and there is no intention either to operate at a profit to the Ministry or to cross-subsidise other Ministry services.

So far as individual producers are concerned, it should be noted that wholesale producers are visited once every two years on average, so £90 a visit is equivalent to £45 a year on average. Wholesale producers who maintain high standards of compliance with the regulations are visited about once every three years or less frequently, and for them the proposed charge is equivalent to £30 a year or less. The charge will not be subject to VAT and will be allowable against income and corporation tax.

The Milk Marketing Board has made representations about the proposed charge of £90 and my officials have explained how it is calculated.

Thames Barrier

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he will not provide information to right hon. Members and hon. Members regarding outstanding payments in respect of the Thames barrier about which his Department has been kept informed by the London residuary body.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 17 November 1986, c. 17]: Questions of grant aid on the Thames barrier fall within my Department's responsibilities. Payments are being made as the expenditure eligible for grant is verified. Much detailed information remains either to be provided or examined in my Department.

North Sea (Chemical Spillage)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to monitor the impact in the North sea of the toxic chemical spillage from the Sandoz factory in Switzerland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 18 November 1986, c. 95]: My scientists have been in regular contact with their counterparts in the Netherlands responsible for the surveillance of the Rhine estuary and its adjacent coastal waters. In view of the natural dilution and breakdown of the toxic chemicals which has already taken place, and the direction of the prevailing water flows along the continental coast, it seems unlikely that there will be any significant impact on the marine environment of the North sea as a whole or on its fisheries. In addition to their normal monitoring activities, my scientists will, however, maintain close contact with their colleagues elsewhere in Europe who are more directly concerned with the impact of the incident.

ENERGY

Industrial Gas

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the impact on United Kingdom manufacturing industry of the decrease in industrial gas prices in France, Holland, West Germany and Italy between October 1985 and July 1986; what steps he proposes to take to ensure that the United Kingdom industry is able to compete against a background of decreasing prices of industrial gas in other European countries; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The rapid fall in oil prices has led to decreases in gas prices in the United Kingdom as well as in Europe. Since July 1986 oil prices have risen and some gas prices will follow. Industry's concern must be the continuing level of its energy costs; United Kingdom gas costs have been and remain within the overall range of those in other European countries.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will publish in the Official Report in tabulated form information available to him on the price in pence per therm of industrial gas for each of the last eight quarterly periods for which records are available for each of the following countries (a) United Kingdom, (b) France, (c) Holland, (d) West Germany and (e) Italy; what assessment he has made of the impact of falling oil prices on the price of industrial gas in each of these countries; what as a percentage, is the change in prices of industrial gas in each of these countries; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Although my Department uses a variety of sources to assess the general level of prices in other countries, official figures broken down by the quarters are not available. However, prior to the fall in oil prices United Kingdom industrial gas prices were towards the bottom of the range for Europe as a whole. Some European prices, notably in Italy and Holland, are more closely tied to oil prices than others and fell sharply. But they can be expected to follow the recent increased oil prices. Meanwhile United Kingdom prices, which have themselves fallen, remain within the overall range of European prices.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) how much plutonium has been created at the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, Winfrith steam generating heavy water reactor nuclear station since it was commissioned; what quantity of this plutonium has been reprocessed and to what purpose any reprocessed plutonium thus arising has been put;

(2) what volume of low-level nuclear waste has arisen from the reprocessing of imported Magnox spent nuclear fuel from Italy and Japan since such imports began;

(3) what volume of spent fuel and what quantity of plutonium have been subjected to safeguards oversight by Euratom inspectors during reprocessing since March.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Gas

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement about the privatisation of British Gas.

Mr. Peter Walker: This morning, the offer for sale of 4,025,500,000 ordinary shares in British Gas plc has been fully underwritten at a price of 135p per share. 1,615 million shares are initially being offered to the general public including British Gas customers, employees and pensioners. If the United Kingdom public offer is at least twice subscribed, this number will be increased to 2,579·2 million shares, some 64 per cent. of the total. 1,615 million shares are initially being offered to United Kingdom financial institutions, with the balance being made available to investors in the United States, Canada, Europe and Japan. The underwriting arrangements, which for the first time have been fully synchronised around the world and have included a competitive element, have been put in place at the most competitive rates ever achieved in a Government primary offering.

Prospectuses and application forms will be published in newspapers from Tuesday 25 November. Everyone who has registed with the British Gas share information office will be sent a mini-prospectus and a personalised application form. Copies will also be available from 25 November in banks, post offices and British Gas showrooms. Applications have to be received by 10 am on Wednesday 3 December. Copies of the prospectus have been placed in the Library of the House today.

Small investors will be offered a choice of bonus shares or gas vouchers. I am advised that someone buying 400 shares and opting for vouchers can expect a gross return of 21 per cent. over the first year. Similarly, someone buying 400 shares and choosing the bonus shares can expect a gross return of 11 per cent. per year over the first three years. These calculations assume that both the share price and the dividend payments remain constant.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to make available material prepared by his Department on the abandonment of North sea oil and gas installations.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have today arranged for copies of a paper prepared by my Department for the fisheries and offshore oil consultative group (FOOCG) in June 1985 and a paper given by a senior official of my Department to a public conference on planning for abandonment in July 1985 to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Secondary Schools (Intake)

Mr. Merlyn Rees asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils entered the first form in maintained secondary schools in (a) England and Wales, (b) the city of Leeds district council and (c) the parliamentary constituency of Morley and Leeds, South.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the number of pupils entering maintained secondary schools is not collected on a regular basis. The nearest approximation is the number of pupils in school whose ages were at or below the designated lower limit of the school's age range. The number of such pupils in maintained secondary schools (excluding middle deemed secondary) in Leeds local education authority and in England in January 1986 were 9,140 and 592,339 respectively. Figures for areas smaller than local education authorities are not readily available centrally.

Figures for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

GCSE and TVEI

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of the effect that the general certificate of secondary education and technical and vocational education initiative will have on A-levels and university entrance; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The standards set by general certificate of secondary education examinations will be at least as high, grade for grade, as those set by the O-level and CSE examinations which they replace. The GCE boards are already undertaking the minor revisions required to ensure that A-level courses, whilst maintaining their standards of excellence and providing a foundation for degree courses, also build naturally upon GCSE courses.

The technical and vocational education initiative (TVEI) caters for students, across the full ability range, following courses which lead to nationally recognised qualifications. It is promoting a wide range of developments, including the introduction of new A-level courses. Such matters are discussed with educational interests concerned at local and national levels. The Government are continuing to monitor and assess the progress of the initiative including accreditation and examination developments.

Listed Buildings

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total of University Grants Committee funds that has been applied to the upkeep of listed buildings in each of the last three years for which figures are available to him.

Mr. Walden: This information is not available.

Student Grants

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will be announcing his plans for the future of student grants.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend will publish any proposals that he may have for the future of student grants in the light of the work of the student support review, which is currently underway.

"Just Say No" Video

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the extent to which the Grange Hill anti-drug abuse video "Just Say No" has been distributed to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The BBC has distributed 380 copies of the Grange Hill "Just Say No" video. It is not known how many of these copies were sent to schools. I have commended this video to schools, but it is for individual schools to decide which of the many video and training materials available that they wish to use when teaching pupils about the dangers of drug misuse.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Attorney-General whether magistrates involved in trying motoring offences are expected to possess a current driving licence.

The Attorney-General: No.

Mr. Peter Wright (Australian Court Case)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General on what basis Her Majesty's Government are party to an injunction sought by Mr. George Russell Leigh against Mr. Peter Wright in Australia in relation to the publication of Mr. Wright's book on the security services.

The Attorney-General: The Government are not a party to any such proceedings.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General whether he will estimate the cost to date of the legal fees expended by Her Majesty's Government in defence of the Government's position in connection with the Wright case, giving figures for the United Kingdom and Australia, respectively.

The Attorney-General: The cost to date of the legal fees paid by Her Majesty's Government in the action in Australia against Heinemann Publishers Australia Pty Limited and Peter Wright is estimated at £67,000. These fees have all been paid in Australia.

Mr. Chapman Pincher

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General on what basis he reached his decision that there were no legal grounds to proceed against Mr. Chapman Pincher for breach of confidence in respect of his book, "Their Trade is Treachery".

The Attorney-General: It would be inappropriate for me to comment on matters at issue in the proceedings concerning the Peter Wright case in Australia, while those proceedings continue.

Joan Miller

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General if he will bring an action in the Irish courts for breach of confidence against Brandon, publishers of, "One Girl's War" by Joan Miller, former special assistant to Maxwell Knight, the former head of MI5's counter-subversion unit; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: This matter is under consideration.

DEFENCE

Iran and Iraq

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) military equipment, (b) industrial equipment and (c) chemicals have been sold to (i) Iran and (ii) Iraq over the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the consistent policy of this and previous Administrations not to reveal details of specific defence exports to other countries. Any sales to Iran and Iraq would of course be subject to the guidelines set out in the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in reply to a question by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel).

On the question of industrial equipment and chemical exports to Iran and Iraq I refer the hon. Member for Cardiff, West to the publication "Overseas Trade Statistics for the United Kingdom" which can be found in the Library. The figures relating to industrial equipment come at table 5, division 71-74. Those for chemicals are shown at Table 5, Divisions 51 and 52.

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he intends to make representations to the European Economic Community countries to inquire what military equipment, industrial equipment or chemical products are being sold to Iran and Iraq; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. Most Governments do not make public details on defence sales, nor are defence sales covered by the Treaty of Rome. Statistics on exports of industrial equipment and chemical products from European countries are published by the European Commission in Eurostat, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

RAF, Woolwich

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number and grades of personnel in each of the Royal Air Force units based at Woolwich.

Mr. Freeman: The numbers and grades of civilians employed by RAF units at Royal Arsenal Woolwich on 1 October 1986 are as follows:

It is not our practice, for security reasons, to release details of the numbers and grades of service personnel at individual units.

Nimrod

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision on the Nimrod airborne early warning system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We aim to reach a final decision by the end of the year.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps have been taken to ensure the long-term safety of the Calder Hall and Chapel Cross military production reactors operated by British Nuclear Fuels Limited with regard to the future needs and security of supply of fissionable materials for defence purposes.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Under the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 and the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 responsibility for the safety of the reactors at Calder Hall and Chapel Cross rests with BNFL. It would not be in the national interest to give details of future defence requirements and sources of supply of fissile materials.

Fissionable Materials

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if his Department has any contingency plans for management of fissionable materials removed from (a) nuclear warheads and (b) nuclear submarine cores as a result of successful multilateral nuclear disarmament negotiations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if any contingency studies have been conducted by Her Majesty's Government for the redeployment of unsafeguarded military fissionable materials such as plutonium or enriched uranium in the safeguarded civil nuclear material stockpile in the event of the successful completion of nuclear disarmament agreements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The achievement of the Government's long term goal of general and complete disarmament, including nuclear disarmament, is regrettably, not a near term prospect. The question is therefore a hypothetical one on which I am not prepared to speculate.

Security Services

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions the secretary of the D Notice committee has advised publishers of books that material in books they are proposing to publish contains information on the security services which cannot be published; and in the case of which books.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1967 the secretary of the defence press and broadcasting committee has offered advice to publishers of 36 books that some amendments should be made on grounds of national security. However, discussions between the secretary of the defence press and broadcasting committee and the press, broadcasting authorities and publishers are regarded as having taken place in confidence, and I do not therefore intend to name the books concerned.

BAOR

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will estimate the quantity of non-military electrical equipment which has been installed at the British Army on the Rhine for each of the following periods (i) between the installation of BAOR and the accession of the United Kingdom to the treaty of Rome and (ii) from the aforementioned accession to date.

Mr. Chope: I have been asked to reply.

Records are not available to enable such estimates to be made.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what restrictions exist in respect of the installation of non-military electrical equipment at the British Army of the Rhine regarding (i) the nationalities of contractors carrying out such work and (ii) the electrical safety standards required to be attributable to any such equipment installed.

Mr. Christopher Chope: I have been asked to reply.

There are no known nationality restrictions imposed on electrical contractors operating in Germany. Contractors working on high voltage or medium voltage systems must however be registered with the local German Lander authority, and to qualify must employ one or more electricians registered with the Germany authority as Meisters.

Electrical installations must conform to German national standards or agreed equivalents, and only materials and equipment may be used which have been manufactured in accordance with the state of safety regulations valid in the European Community. The sign of an officially recognised testing office testifies that these requirements have been met. Installation contractors are however legally responsible for any failure of the completed scheme and any equipment provided. They cover this risk by insurance which again specifies the use of equipment conforming with recognised standards normally used in the trade in Germany.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will estimate the number of contracts for both the supply and installation of non-military electrical equipment at the BAOR which have been awarded since accession of the United Kingdom to the treaty of Rome to British contractors; whether he will further estimate as a percentage of total contracts for both supply and installation the number of such contracts awarded to British contractors; whether he will further estimate the number of such contracts awarded to West German contractors; whether he will indicate what restrictions exist to prevent British contractors obtaining a greater number of such contracts: whether he will estimate the value in £ sterling of (i) the contracts obtained by British contractors and (ii) the contracts obtained by contractors of any other nationality; whether he will seek estimates of the number of jobs which could be created in the electrical industry by transferring such work entirely to British contractors; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I have been asked to reply.

It is not possible to provide the information required on the numbers or value of contracts awarded in the form required because records are not kept in that form. I am not aware of any restrictions which would prevent British contractors obtaining a greater number of contracts. It is PSA's policy to encourage the use of British non-military electrical equipment where possible and bulk purchases of domestic cookers, catering equipment, security equipment and incinerators, convector heaters and domestic appliances have been made in recent years.

The average value of electrical installation work tendered for in property occupied by BAOR is about DM80 million per annum. The great majority of this work is placed with German contractors, but some with Dutch and Belgian contractors for work originating in those countries. British contractors have been responsible for a number of specialised electrical installations connected with security requirements, static power provision and boiler control automation.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

South Africa

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to which groups in South Africa Her Majesty's Government allocated almost £1 million in 1985, referred to in an Overseas Development Agency press release of 21 October as being mainly in the fields of education and training for non white South Africans.

Mr. Eggar: The funds in question were allocated to individuals rather than to groups. They were used to promote the educational and social development of members of the black, coloured and Asian communities in South Africa.

WALES

Psychiatric Unit

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales when the first medium secure psychiatric unit is to be built in Wales; and when he expects subsequent units to be commenced.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) on 3 November 1986 at column 303.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of those Welsh people who have been out of work for five years or more have never been in full-time employment since leaving school.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is not available.

PRIME MINISTER

Value Added Tax

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the implications for national sovereignty of the decision of the European Commission to initiate proceedings in the European Court on the legality of the zero rate of value added tax applied by the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The Commission has the right to institute infraction proceedings against member states under article 169 of the EEC Treaty. We are of course fighting the VAT zero-rating case vigorously.

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if the letter of 6 January from the Solicitor-General to the Secretary of State for Defence about Westland was covered by the Official Secrets Act.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Rupert Allason

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if the Government have given permission for current and former members of the security services to speak, and show documents, to Rupert Allason alias Nigel West at any time since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: It would be inappropriate for me to comment on matters which are or may be at issue in the proceedings concerning the Peter Wright case in Australia, while those proceedings continue.

Iran (Weapons Sales)

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what information the United States Government have conveyed to Her Majesty's Government about the activities in London of Mr. Samuel Evans, an American lawyer living in London, in connection with the sale or proposed sale by him of lethal weapons to Iran; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what information the United States Government have conveyed to Her Majesty's Government about the activities in London of the retired Israeli General Brigadier-General Avraham Bar-Am in connection with the sale or proposed sale by him of lethal weapons to Iran; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Peter Wright (Court Case)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister what is the total number of persons who have been sent by Her Majesty's Government to Australia in connection with the case of Mr. Peter Wright.

The Prime Minister: During the past six months, a total of nine persons have had cause to be sent by Her Majesty's Government to Australia in connection with the case of Mr. Peter Wright.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister what class of travel was used by those persons who have been sent by Her Majesty's Government to Australia in connection with the Wright case.

The Prime Minister: The civil servants sent by Her Majesty's Government to Australia in connection with the Wright case travelled first or club class, in accordance with the instructions set out in paragraphs 4516 and 4517 of the Civil Service pay and conditions of service code, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister what is the cost, including transport, accommodation and all allowances, of sending Sir Robert Armstrong, Mr. John Bailey and supporting staff, including secretarial assistants, cypher operators and representatives of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to Australia for the Wright case.

The Prime Minister: The costs incurred to date of sending Sir Robert Armstrong, Mr. John Bailey and supporting staff to Australia for the Wright case are estimated to be of the order of £30,000.

Security (Publications)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister (1) on what date Her Majesty's Government first became aware of the intended publication of "Their Trade is Treachery", by Chapman Pincher; "Conspiracy of Silence", by Freeman and Penrose; "The Second Oldest Profession", by Philip Knightley; and "A Matter of Trust (MI5 1945-72)", by Nigel West; and on what date Her Majesty's Government actually received proof copies of these books;

(2) if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to comply with any order by courts in Australia for disclosure of information relating to its prior knowledge and authorisation of books by Mr. Chapman Pincher and Mr. Nigel West containing confidential material on the United Kingdom security services; and if she will make a statement;

(3) why no steps were taken to trace and interview the sources of material contained in the book, "Their Trade is Treachery", by Chapman Pincher, during the two months when the relevant manuscript was in Her Majesty's Government's possession prior to publication.

The Prime Minister: It would be inappropriate for me to comment on matters which are or may be at issue in the proceedings concerning the Peter Wright case in Australia, while those proceedings continue.

TRANSPORT

Microlite Aircraft

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the number of accidents and fatalities involving microlites for each year from 1981 to the current date;

(2) if he will list the regulations governing the safety of microlites;

(3) what provisions are planned to enhance the safety of microlites.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority, which is statutorily responsible for all aviation safety matters, has given me the following information:

(a) The accidents and fatalities involving microlight aircraft for each year from 1981 to date are as follows:

	Number of accidents	Fatalities
1982	26	10
1983	24	5
1984	14	5
1986	16	2

(b) Microlight aircraft safety is governed by the Air Navigation Order 1985 (ANO) and the Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control Regulations 1985. Specific requirements for microlight aircraft pilot licensing, airworthiness and manufacturing standards stemming from the ANO are published by the CAA in civil aviation publication No. 53 and British civil airworthiness requirements, sections S and A respectively.

(c) Following the recent removal of the lower weight limit of 70 kgs for the application of airworthiness requirements, the CAA has no plans at present to introduce any new regulations directed specifically at microlight aeroplanes.

Commercial Balloonists

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to provide for commercial balloonists' licences to enable balloonists to carry passengers for reward.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Provision is already made in the Air Navigation Order 1985 for the issue by the Civil Aviation Authority of commercial pilots licence (balloons). Although none has ever been issued the CAA is currently consulting the British Balloon and Airship club on the requirements for such a licence.

Coaches and Lorries (Speed Limiters)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will be introducing measures requiring the installation of maximum speed limiters for coaches and heavy lorries.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Work has now been completed within the British Standards Institution on a draft British standard for road vehicle speed limiters. We will be consulting interested parties early next year on draft regulations based on the standard, which will require speed limiters to be fitted to coaches. The regulations will apply first to new coaches and at a later date to coaches already in use. We have no plans at present to require speed limiters to be fitted to heavy lorries.

Endangered Species

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to require airlines to provide their passengers with adequate advice about the restrictions on the import of items derived from endangered species, whether animals or plants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have no statutory power to direct airlines in this way. The control of trade in endangered species is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I understand that his Department has been active in publicity given to the problems of bringing into this country both live specimens and items which have been derived from endangered species. Airport authorities are being encouraged to give prominence to posters and illustrated leaflets on the subject and articles have appeared in various airlines' "in-flight" magazines. Other publicity measures are also in preparation.

Airfields

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) why he has limited the requirement for the establishment of local consultation committees to 37 of the operational airfields open to the public in the United Kingdom;

(2) what criteria he has adopted for placing a limit on the need for local consultation committees at commercial airfields in the United Kingdom;

(3) whether he will take steps to extend the requirement for local consultation to all United Kingdom licensed airfields; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been reviewing my Department's policy on the designation of aerodromes for consultative purposes under section 35 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. About 40 aerodromes are already designated, and I have no plans to remove any active aerodromes from this list. I have concluded that in principle we should designate any other airport which meets the criterion for economic regulation in section 37(2) and (3) of the Airports Act 1986 in terms of having an annual turnover of more than £1 million. We should also be prepared to designate additional smaller aerodromes in response to representations made to us in particular cases, where designation is likely to be helpful in alleviating local problems. I have not set any limit to the number of designations.

Transport Act

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the costs to district councils of the operation of the Transport Act 1986; what information he has about regional variations in these costs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall answer this question shortly.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the reason for delay in transferring properties to his Department from the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The necessary paperwork.

M20 Service Station

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received against the siting of the M20 service station at Hollingbourne.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have received representations from my hon. Friend on behalf of Maidstone borough council, from that council itself and from a member of the public. In addition, Hollingbourne parish council made representations against the proposal at the public inquiry into the proposal for the Hollingbourne interchange on the M20.

CIVIL SERVICE

Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Minister for the Civil Service what will be the spending of all Government departments and agencies on fees to outside consultants in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for (a) the current year, (b) next year and (c) the average of the years 1970 to 1974; (i) the ratio of public spending to national output, (ii) public spending, (iii) national output, (iv) spending on unemployment benefit, (v) spending on social security benefit, (vi) spending to meet interest charges, (vii) spending on investment in the nationalised industries, (viii) spending on the National Health Service and (ix) spending on local government services.

Mr. MacGregor: The available figures are as follows:

£ billion

		1986-87	1987-88	Average of the years 1970-71 to 1974-75
(i)	General government expenditure as a percentage of GDP	43¼ per cent.	42¾ per cent.	42½ per cent.
(ii)	General Government expenditure	164·4	173·7	29·6
(iii)	GDP at market prices	380	407	69·0

Media Advertising

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the estimated spending of all Government Departments and agencies on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Press and public relations staff are employed in all Government Departments and agencies; and how many were employed in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Brooke: Available records of overall numbers of press and public relations staff employed in Government Departments and agencies relate to the information officer group only. The numbers employed at 1 April of each year were as follows:

	Senior Information Officer and lower grades	Principal Information Officer	Chief Information Officer
1979	1,095	131	66
1980	1,083	128	63
1981	1,022	130	64
1982	980	111	62
1983	928	111	62
1984	892	111	n/a
1985	883	111	n/a
1986	833	n/a	n/a

Note n/a—not available; chief and principal information officer grades were incorporated into the open structure on 1 January 1984 and 1 January 1986 respectively.

Pensions

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report such information as he has on the numbers in receipt of part of their pension in tax free lump sums in 1985-86 (a) up to £25,000, (b) up to £50,000 and (c) up to £75,000 and the cost to the Exchequer for each of those bands.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the estimated spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising, respectively, and other promotional literature in the current year; and what was the total in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 230]: The figures are as follows:

£ '000

Year	Total	Of which advertising sales of Government shareholdings
1979-80	305	276
1980-81	62	—
1981-82	422	315
1982-83	81	—
1983-84	1,382	1,258
1984-85	73	—
1985-86	6,787	6,756
1986-87[1]	32	—

[1] Budget.

None of this expenditure was on television or radio advertising. The costs of advertising sales of Government shareholdings is financed from the proceeds of such share sales.

EC (Finance)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the European Economic Community Commission challenge on the zero rating of news services for value added tax purposes includes newspapers and broadcasting licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 20 November 1986, c. 315]: No. The Commission's challenge is on our zero-rating of certain news services under group 6 of schedule 5 to the VAT Act 1983, that is

"The supply to newspapers or to the public of information of a kind published in newspapers" in so far as they relate to the supply of news services to industry.

Housing (Taxation)

Mr. Raynsford asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue at outturn prices for the current year if inheritance tax was applied to housing at current tax rates but with a threshold of nil.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Inheritance tax applies to all assets, including housing, where the cumulative total of chargeable transfers exceeds £71,000. If, instead of being charged to inheritance tax, housing were charged separately at the current tax rates and bands, with a nil threshold, but with the existing exemption for transfers to a surviving spouse, the additional net yield arising from transfers in 1986-87 is estimated at about £1,000 million. There would be around 100,000 more taxpayers. These estimates make no allowance for the effect of the proposal on the housing market.

EC Economic and Finance Council

Mr. Raffan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the latest meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council.

Mr. Lawson: The ECOFIN council met in Brussels on Monday, 17 November, under my chairmanship. My hon. friend, the Minister of State, Treasury, represented the United Kingdom.

The council adopted two further internal market directives. The first was a directive to remove exchange controls over certain capital transactions within the Community. The adoption of this directive represents a significant step forward in the process of achieving complete liberalisation of capital movements within the Community by 1992.

The second was the 13th VAT directive which harmonises the system for refunding VAT to traders established in third countries.

The council agreed in principle that 1·5 billion ecu—about £1·1 billion — should be made available for lending to small and medium-sized enterprises throughout the Community. The money would be raised in two tranches of 750 mecu each: the first tranche to be borrowed by the Commission and the second by the European Investment bank. In both cases, the European Investment bank would be responsible for managing the lending.

The council had a first discussion of the Commission's annual economic report. There was broad agreement on its latest draft. The Commission will now consider various detailed amendments put forward by member states. The amended report is due to be adopted at the December ECOFIN in the light of opinions expressed by the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Committee.

The council took note of a presidency report on progress made on indirect tax matters during the United Kingdom presidency. It invited COREPER to speed up its examination of proposals on VAT and excise duties, particularly on the draft VAT directive on the threshold and other matters concerning small businesses.

The council discussed two items under article 8 of the budget discipline conclusions, which provides that ECOFIN should examine, before they are adopted, programmes with considerable financial implications over several years. The items discussed were the Commission's proposals for a Community research and development framework programme for 1987-91, and for a fisheries structures programme. The council stressed the need for cost-effective measures, and for provision to be considered in the context of the annual budget procedure and in the light of the available resources for all Community programmes.

EMPLOYMENT

Restart Scheme

Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General how many claimants have been referred to unemployment review officers or claimant advisers for failure to attend restart interviews; how many have subsequently appealed; and how many have been refused after appeal.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No claimants have been referred to unemployment review officers of the Department of Health and Social Security nor to the new claimant advisers of the Department of Employment as a result of having failed to attend a restart interview. It is not part of their duties to take decisions on such cases.

Portsmouth

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General what have been the major causes for loss of jobs in the Portsmouth area in the last seven years.

Mr. Lee: The major causes of the loss of jobs in the Portsmouth area have been the reduction in numbers at Portsmouth naval base, the decline in labour intensive, traditional industries and general lack of competitiveness.

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many people in Portsmouth have left the employment register through the restart programme since it started.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

YTS

Mr. Hayward asked the Paymaster General whether he has any plans to introduce YTS in the Department of Employment group.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. We are designing a YTS scheme to operate from next Easter in the Department of Employment and Manpower Services Commission. Officials of the Department and the Commission are consulting trade union representatives about the details.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, column 216]: The total spending of my Department on press and public relations in 1985-86 was £1,425,592. The figures for previous years are not available.

Community Programme

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General if he will list the new guidelines, and changes in the rules, of the community programme agreed with the Confederation of British Industry task force for the private sector pilot projects.

Mr. Lee: Following consultation with the Confederation of British Industry about increasing the involvement of the private sector in the community programme my right hon. and noble Friend wrote to the CBI on 5 June and gave agreement to the setting up of a number of experimental community programme projects.

The basic ground rules for the experiment are: (i) It will apply to up to 10 private sponsored projects in any part of the country plus any other such projects in the inner city areas covered by city action teams or the inner cities initiative with an upper limit of 20 projects across the country as a whole.

(ii) Suitable experimental projects should be directly sponsored by the business sector and be likely to lead to the creation of permanent jobs at the end of the projects and/or to enhance significantly the skills of the community programme workforce.

The changes to the normal community programme funding rules must be negotiated project by project but can include:

the funding of a feasibility study and preparatory work for a project involving over 20 places up to a limit of £10,000 per project;

a commitment to two-year funding of projects on the same basis as existing two year commitments to community refurbishment schemes;

a higher level of operating costs (up to a maximum of £750 per authorised place) where that can be shown to be justified by the higher skill level or higher output of the project;

a willingness to consider a lower supervisor/participant ratio (with a lower limit of 1:5) for appropriate projects;

a willingness to use the existing waiver rules to allow one key worker per project to be seconded from the employer's workforce as manager or supervisor and to be reimbursed up to the current community programme rates for managers and supervisors.

The aim of the experiment is to test rigorously the CBIs contention that higher unit costs for certain private sector sponsored projects will result in much higher outputs in terms of economic and social benefits.

Construction Industry

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General what percentage of those killed and injured in the construction industry in 1985 were (a) employed by large firms, (b) employed by small firms or (c) self-employed.

Mr. Lee: The percentage of employees killed in the construction industry who worked for: (a) firms employing 80 or more employees was 32 per cent.; (b) firms employing fewer than 80 employees was 68 per cent. Such information relating to those people injured, but not killed, is not available.

(c) The percentage of workers killed in the construction industry who were self-employed was 18 per cent. For workers suffering a reported major injury, 5 per cent. were self-employed.

The figures relate to occupational deaths or major injuries to employees and self-employed people, reported under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations (NADOR) 1980 to authorities responsible for enforcing the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. Major injuries are as defined under NADOR.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Education)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those prison establishments which are currently permitting prisoners to attend outside education courses under Home Office circular instruction 8/81.

Mr. Mellor: The latest information collated centrally relates to the academic year 1984-85. In that year prisoners in the following establishments were granted temporary release for educational purposes:

HMP Askham Grange
HMDC Buckley Hall
HMP Cookham Wood
HMYCC Dover
HMYCC/HMP East Sutton Park
HMP Featherstone
HMP Ford
HMYCC Hatfield
HMP/YCC Hewell Grange
HMP Highpoint
HMP Kirkham
HMP Leyhill
HMYCC Lowdham Grange
HMP Nottingham
HMP Pentonville
HMP Soring Hill
HM DC Whatton

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Pentonville prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; how many classes took place and for how many hours; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during that week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the workshops were open for an average of 15½ hours; an average of 355 prisoners were employed each working day in the workshops and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 88 education classes (51 day-time and 37 evening) took place for a total of 482 hours; there were an average of six prisoners in each class. It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, association, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out-of-cell activities.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Pentonville prison on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: Five hundred.

Hazardous Loads (Newhaven)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last year lorries carrying radioactive uranium hexaflouride have been delayed at customs at Newhaven because of lorry defects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There is no record of any defects in such vehicles having been identified by the police or by Department of Transport vehicle examiners at Newhaven. I understand that one vehicle was found by local authority trading standards officers to be overweight on one axle, but was allowed to proceed after the load had been redistributed.

Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics are available detailing numbers of convictions in the United Kingdom, region by region, of those sentenced under the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980.

Mr. Mellor: The available information, which may be incomplete, refers to the number of exclusion orders made under the Act, and is given in the table below. The collection of this information was discontinued at the beginning of 1985.

Exclusion orders made under the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980

England and Wales — Number of orders

	1981	1982	1983	1984
Police force region:
Metropolitan police district	0	2	14	1
North West	5	24	17	30
North East	7	23	54	31
Midlands	9	10	15	17
Eastern	9	25	35	42
South East	8	26	28	13
South West	7	23	8	21
Wales	9	24	7	15
England and Wales	54	157	178	170

Prison Sentences

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to (a) the maximum, (b) the minimum and (c) the average sentences given for (i) robbery with assault, (ii) rape, (iii) armed robbery and (iv) murder in each of the last five years.

Mr. David Mellor: The readily available information is published annually in "Criminal statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" — for 1985, under classifications 1 (murder), 19 (rape) and 34 (robbery), in tables S1·1(A), S1·4 and S1·5 of volume 1 and tables S2·1(A), S2·4 and S2·5 of volume 2.

The figures for rape include offences of aiding and abetting and attempted rape, while those for robbery do not distinguish cases where actual force or firearms were used. Over the years 1981 to 1985 the sentences imposed ranged from a discharge to life imprisonment for both rape and robbery; life imprisonment is the mandatory sentence for those convicted of murder.

Liverpool Prison

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many hours in the most recent convenient week the workshops in Liverpool prison were open; what was the average number of prisoners employed; what was the average number of prisoners in each class; and how much time on average each prisoner spent out of his cell during that week.

Mr. Mellor: In the week commencing 3 November 1986, the workshops were open for an average of 23½ hours; an average of 719 prisoners were employed each working day in the workshops and on catering, maintenance, cleaning and other domestic tasks; 72 education classes (46 day-time and 26 evening) took place for a total of 183 hours; there were an average of 7·5 prisoners in each class.

It is not practical to calculate the average amount of time spent out of cells since this covers many things apart from work and education including, for example, exercise, association, visits, use of the prison library and canteen and other out-of-cell activities.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many baths, showers and toilets are available to prisoners in Liverpool prison; how many baths or showers each prisoner is allowed per week; and how many changes of clothes each prisoner is allowed per week.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of baths, showers and toilets available are as follows:

	No.
Baths	12
Showers	60
WCs	119
Urinals	159

Each prisoner is normally allowed one shower per week and an additional shower when he makes use of the gymnasium. Additional showers are available for prisoners employed on jobs of a physically dirty nature and on return from court appearances. When appropriate for medical reasons a bath is available instead of a shower.

Prisoners at Liverpool have one change of clothes per week consisting of two shirts, two pairs of socks, two pairs of underpants and two vests. Overclothing is changed as necessary, but on return from court, prisoners receive a full kit of clean clothes.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the maximum number of prisoners who can be employed in Liverpool prison on any one day.

Mr. Mellor: Seven hundred and sixty.

Mr. J. Rajiah

Mr. Andrew Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information was passed to the Spanish police by the United Kingdom authorities concerning the car in which Mr. J. Rajiah, a constituent of the hon. Member for Basingstoke, was travelling on 29 October and in which he was shot by Spanish police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am informed that no such information has been sought by the Spanish police.

Vienna System Micro-computers

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis a Canadian company, Northern Telecom, has supplied Vienna system micro-computers to his Department for use by police forces in crime prevention and detection; to what precise uses they will be put; which forces are involved; how these computers will interact with existing police computers; if Her Majesty's Government have entered into any commitment regarding further acquisitions of computers from this company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Twenty micro-computers are being donated by Northern Telecom as a contribution to the Government's general crime prevention campaign. We welcome this generous gift. They will be used by the police for the analysis of crime patterns, to gather information relating to violent crime and in support of local crime prevention projects.

A number of forces have indicated an interest in the micro-computers, which have yet to be allocated. It is not the intention to integrate the micro-computers with existing police computer systems. My Department has not entered into any commitment regarding the purchase of computers from this company.

Young Unknowns Gallery, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to details of the items taken by the police from the Young Unknowns Gallery, London SE1, on 31 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner that on 31 October, officers of the counterfeit currency squad went to the Young Unknowns Gallery, London SE1 to investigate possible offences under section 18 of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981. Some 26 items, including drawings and paintings of currency, were seized. The matter has been referred to the Bank of England to consider whether proceedings should be instituted.

Griess Test

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has received since September 1985 about the efficacy of the Griess test; and what action he has taken as a result.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The results of work performed by two independent forensic scientists have been considered as part of a re-appraisal of the Griess test conducted by the Home Office forensic science service. We are considering the findings in the context of our review of the case of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. G. W. Walker

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mr. G. W. Walker retired as director of the Home Office laboratory at Chorley; why he retired; and what was his age upon retirement.

Mr. Hurd: Mr. G. W. Walker retired from the Home Office on 31 October 1985 on reaching the age of 60, the normal age of retirement.

BRL and the Post Office

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the increased efficiency of handling BRL work by the Post Office; and if he will make a statement about the future of BRL and the Post Office.

Mr. Mellor: The number of television licences in force stands at an all-time record level of nearly 19 million; 300,000 more than at the same time last year. This reflects increased effectiveness by the Post Office in BRL work. The arrangements for financing the BBC, including the future of the licence fee and how it is collected, are currently under review in the light of the report of the Peacock committee, debated by this House yesterday.

Special Event Radio

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the experiment in special event radio.

Mr. Hurd: In reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) on 28 January 1986 at col 486, I announced a two year experiment in licensing low-powered transmitters to provide information or other services to those attending the sites of festivals, county shows, sporting events and so on. Up to 25 licences were to be made available each year, with provision for reissue of licences to cover broadcasts at more than one event on separate occasions at the same site.

During 1986, 32 applications for licences were received. Some of these were subsequently withdrawn, and one was refused because it did not meet the criteria for the experiment. A total of 13 licences were issued in respect of 31 corporate events. These included festivals, rallies, shows and sporting events.

Licences during the second year of the experiment in 1987 will be available on the same basis as in 1986. Applications should reach the Home Office by 31 January 1987. Details of the licence conditions and procedure are set out in notes for the guidance of potential applicants, available from the Home Office. The subject of special event broadcasting will be included in the Green Paper on radio policy.

ENVIRONMENT

Lighting

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will assess the impact on the United Kingdom lighting industry of German electrical restrictions; and if he will make a statement.

(2) why restrictions are placed on the use of United Kingdom manufactured luminaires in British bases in Germany; what steps he has taken or proposes to take concerning such restrictions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Any restrictions must impact on the United Kingdom lighting industry, but I cannot assess the precise extent. Some of the apparent restrictions are already the subject of specific representations by officials from DTI and the Lighting Industry Federation.

Homelessness

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations and statistical information he has received concerning housing and homelessness in the London boroughs as compared to the metropolitan districts; what account he proposes to take of them in making his next grant allocation to local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Options were put forward to CCLGF in July to extend the GRE for non-HRA housing to include data on number of homeless. This was supported by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of London Authorities, but opposed by the London Boroughs Association. In his consultation paper on the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement issued on 3 October the Secretary of State proposed to make no change to the non-HRA GRE formula.

County Hall

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the purchase of County Hall by the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware that ILEA is proposing to purchase County hall.

Seaside and Country Homes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the reasons for the delay in carrying out the assurances given by the Government that the Greater London council seaside and country homes would be transferred to a housing association.

Mr. Chope: Negotiations between the parties are not yet complete.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which Ministers from his Department took part in the nine formal meetings since 12 June between his Department and the London residuary body; and which members of the London residuary body were present.

Mr. Chope: Ministers with responsibility for local government matters met, as appropriate, the chairman and those members of the London residuary body responsible for the LRB's functions that were under discussion.

Home Improvements

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to establish in Bradford one of the new centres to give advice about home improvements; what assessment has been made of the efficacy of agencies in Bradford already providing such advice; if he has consulted Bradford council on this matter; how the new centre will be funded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer this question shortly.

Water Authorities

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of local authority representatives in each water authority in England and Wales in 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. John Patten: Members are not appointed to regional water authorities to represent local authorities. The numbers of members with local government backgrounds are set out below. Membership of the Welsh Water Authority is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Anglian	3	3	1
Northumbrian	3	3	1
North West	6	5	1
Severn Trent	4	4	2
Southern	4	3	1
South West	3	3	2
Thames	4	4	4
Wessex	4	4	2
Yorkshire	3	3	—

Note: The boards were reconstituted on 1 October 1983. The figures show membership on 1 October in each period.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 18 November, if he will list by date, location and substance the toxic waste spillages of which his Department is aware.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 18 November, Official Report, column 128, what is the most recent figure supplied by each of the residuary bodies for redundancy claims and compensation payments made.

Mr. Chope: The figures are as follows:

Residuary body	Number of eligible redundancy claims from ex-GLC and metropolitan county council employees	All compensation payments made
		£000
London	3,114	21,442
Greater Manchester	637	6,948
Merseyside	370	3,479
South Yorkshire	478	3,358
Tyne and Wear	147	1,123
West Midlands	525	4,042
West Yorkshire	936	7,839

Contaminated Land

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he has taken in response to the recommendation made by the Royal Commission on environmental pollution that his Department should issue a planning circular on the development of contaminated land.

Mr. Waldegrave: A draft joint circular from my Department and the Welsh Office was issued for consultation on 31 October 1986. Depending on the comments received, it is proposed to publish the circular in spring 1987. It will contain guidance for prospective developers or purchasers and for local planning authorities on the issues raised when it is proposed to reclaim or reuse contaminated land. This is seen not only as a response to the Royal Commission but also as a valuable contribution to the Government's policy of bringing back into beneficial use, under-used land, particularly in urban areas.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon Advisory Committee

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the terms of reference of the Salmon Advisory Committee; whether it will consider estuarial netting of salmon; and when he expects it to report.

Mr. Gummer: The Salmon Advisory Committee will have the following terms of reference:

"To examine and report on those matters relating to the conservation and development of salmon fisheries in Great Britain which are referred to it by Fisheries Ministers".

In the early stages, we shall be asking the Committee to examine:

1. Particular aspects of the availability of information on the status of salmon stocks in Great Britain; and

2. The influences on the level of those stocks, including the effects of predators and of fishing at low water levels.

The Committee will be expected to report on the various stages of their work as they are completed.

South Downs

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider extending the western boundary of the proposed South Downs environmentally sensitive area to (a) the A285 Chichester to Petworth road or (b) to the River Arun.

Mr. Donald Thompson: We are considering all the representations which we have received about environmentally sensitive areas. We shall make our decisions known as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to make regulations defining the boundary of the proposed South Downs environmentally sensitive area to be created under the provisions of the Agriculture Act 1986.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The boundaries of each environmentally sensitive area will be defined by the order designating that area. I hope to lay the orders before Parliament in good time to invite applications to participate in the scheme early next spring.

Pesticides (Temik)

Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy that the Aldicarb pesticide Temik will not be made available for sale or cleared by the pesticide registration department until an evaluation has been made in the United Kingdom of its effects on the immune system.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Opium Poppies

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what subsidy Her Majesty's Government currently provide for the growing of opium poppies in East Anglia; for what purpose such poppies are grown; what steps are taken to ensure that the resultant crops are not diverted to unlawful purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: There is no subsidy for the growing of poppies in the United Kingdom. This year's very small crop was grown as a replacement for imported seeds which are primarily used in the bakery and confectionery industry. The unlicensed production of controlled drugs from poppies would be an offence under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. My hon. Friend, the Minister of State at the Home Office, has asked the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs urgently to consider the nature of any risk and adequacy of existing Misuse of Drugs Act controls. The council is expected to report to him within the next few weeks.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Japanese Inward Investment

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the figures for Japanese inward investment into the United Kingdom for each of the last 30 years.

Illegal Radio Stations

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of times an illegal radio station has been raided by officers of his Department and the times that the equipment of these stations has been confiscated; and if he will name the stations that have been raided during the last 12 months.

Mr. Butcher: During the 12 months my Department's radio investigation service (RIS) has carried out 218 raids on 84 different unlicensed broadcasting stations. Equipment has been seized on all occasions by the RIS and is detained under their powers under section 79 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 as evidence pending possible court proceedings. At the conclusion of a successful prosecution it is for the courts to decide whether the equipment should be forfeited.

The following is a list of the 84 unlicensed stations raided during the last 12 months.

Shipbuilding Industry

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total number of persons employed in the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry; and how many of these are employed by British Shipbuilders and Harland and Wolff, respectively.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Employment in the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry currently totals some 42,500, of whom 8,700 are employed by British Shipbuilders and 4,800 by Harland and Wolff.

Copyright

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he intends to circulate a consultative document on the reform of the law of copyright; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what initiatives he intends to take to protect United Kingdom copyright industries.

Mr. Pattie: The Government intend to reform copyright law and to this end will introduce a Bill based on the proposals in the recent White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9712) when the parliamentary timetable permits. The drafting of this highly complex Bill is underway and we plan to produce draft clauses for consultation with experts and interested parties in due course.

Post Office

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about plans by the Post Office to further rationalise or reduce its counter network.

Mr. Pattie: Although the Post Office keeps under review the size and shape of the counters network, I am not aware of any plans to rationalise or reduce the network apart from the programme that was announced in 1984 and is due to be completed next year.

EC (Council of Industry Ministers)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made at the recent European Community Council of Industry Ministers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Industry Council met under my chairmanship on 18 November. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry represented the United Kingdom.

From the Chair I welcomed the decision of the Council to help establish the internal market by recommending action to co-ordinate the introduction of a Community-wide integrated services digital network (ISDN) in telecommunications. Such a pan-European network will benefit domestic and business users because connection times will be reduced, and multiple voice and data services will be handled on a single line. It will also create opportunities for manufacturers to supply equipment to a truly European market.

On steel, the Council welcomed a report from the Commission on Eurofer's recent proposals to reduce steelmaking capacity, and invited Eurofer in consultation with the independent producers to submit more detailed plans by 1 March 1987. In the light of these developments, the Council agreed to liberalise category Ic (galvanised sheet) from quotas from 1 January 1987, but decided to postpone further consideration of the other Commission proposals for quota liberalisation until its next meeting in March 1987.

The Council made considerable progress towards agreeing a new directive on state aids to shipbuilding to operate from 1 January 1987. We have been arguing for some time for a directive which forces all member states fully to disclose their aids and which catches all indirect aids to shipowners which are disguised subsidies to shipbuilding. We are now close to achieving this major objective.

On the level of aid the Council concluded that although a level of at least 26 per cent. of cost—that is 35 per cent. of the resulting price—commanded strong support, there were also those in favour of a higher ceiling or possibly two ceilings. Negotiations on the directive are therefore to continue and a further Council has been arranged for 22 December.

Llanelli Radiators

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Rover Group has any plans to dispose of Llanelli Radiators; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that Austin Rover announced today that it is inviting tenders for the purchase of its Llanelli Radiators operation.

End User Certificates

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to monitor compliance with end user certificate arrangements on export defence contracts.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, Thursday 20 November 1986, c. 280]: Export licences are not issued unless the Government are satisfied among other things that the end-use will be as stated in the application. It is not the practice to disclose the nature of post-delivery checks.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has been informed of sales of military equipment being diverted to Iran in contravention of his export licensing arrangements.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 20 November 1986, c. 280]: No.

Domestic Appliances (Noise)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement outlining the non-tariff barriers which have been placed by European Economic Community members on the import of domestic appliances from the United Kingdom; which of these various non-tariff barriers relate to the noise emitted by domestic appliances; and what representations he has received from British manufacturers of domestic appliances about the problems created for them in exporting to Europe in consequence of these non-tariff barriers to trade.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 20 November 1986, c. 278]: In the past certain EEC countries demanded that the electrical safety of imported domestic appliances had to be certified by tests carried out in their own official laboratories. This represented a major non-tariff barrier to United Kingdom exports. The problem has now been solved by determined application of the article 100 directive on the harmonisation of the laws of member states relating to electrical equipment designed for use within certain voltage limits — 73/23/EEC — whereby United Kingdom equipment can now be tested in the United Kingdom.

Similar certification requirements in respect of the noise emitted were proposed by France, Germany and the Netherlands, but enforcement has been postponed awaiting completion of the directive on the noise labelling of domestic appliances. This will prevent any such requirements becoming a barrier to trade.

The question of non-tariff barriers experienced by United Kingdom manufacturers has been, and will continue to be, the subject of dialogue between the United Kingdom industry and the DTI. Should other barriers become apparent the necessary steps will be taken to overcome them.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Nations Association

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the grant to the United Nations Association in each of the past seven years; if the grant has kept pace with inflation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We have regularly given a grant-in-aid to the United Nations Association. For the past seven years the grants have been:

1980-81	22,800
1981-82	23,000
1982-83	24,000
1983-84	24,000
1984-85	24,000
1985-86	24,000
1986-87	24,000

Single European Act

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries have now ratified the Single European Act; and what information he has as to the state procedures to that end have reached in the countries which have not yet ratified.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Kingdom deposited its instrument of ratification on 19 November. Denmark and Belgium have also ratified. All other member states have taken steps to complete their ratification procedures by the end of the year, as agreed.

Drugs Officers

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in securing the agreement of the Government of India to the posting of British drugs officers to Delhi and Bombay; and whether he will indicate the ways in which necessary co-operation between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of India with regard to drug traffickers is now proceeding.

Mr. Eggar: The Indian Government have informed us that the postings of drugs liaison officers to Delhi and Bombay can now take place; and they will do so as soon as the officers concerned have completed their personal arrangements. We welcome this development.

Mr. J. Rajiah

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what practical help has been given by his Department and by British consular staff in Spain to Sri Lankan authorities following the death in Spain at the hands of the Spanish police of Mr. J. Rajiah, a constituent of the hon. Member for Basingstoke;

(2) what assistance has been offered by his Department and by British consular staff in Spain to Sri Lankan authorities following the death in Spain at the hands of Spanish police of Mr. J. Rajiah, a constituent of the hon. Member for Basingstoke;

(3) what representations have been made to the Spanish authorities on the shooting in Spain by Spanish police on Wednesday 29 October of Mr. J. Rajiah, a constituent of the hon. Member for Basingstoke; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Eggar: The British Consul at Seville was in touch with Mr. Rajiah's employers — the Automobile Association—from the time of the incident. He provided assistance with local authorities investigating the death and helped Miss Rajiah to leave Spain under arrangements made by the employers.

Mr. Rajiah was a citizen of Sri Lanka travelling on a Sri Lankan passport. The Sri Lankan High Commission in London was therefore informed of the incident and that on their behalf Her Majesty's Embassy at Madrid had requested from the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs a report from the relevant authorities. The Sri Lankan High Commission was appreciative of the assistance given and has not asked for further assistance.

Hong Kong

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to publish the annual report to Parliament on Hong Kong.

Mr. Renton: The second annual report will be published as a White Paper in the miscellaneous series. It will cover the period from November 1985, the end of the period covered by the first report, to the end of this year. It is hoped to lay it before the House early in 1987. In the future, reports will cover calendar years.

Chile

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the human rights record of the Chilean Government; and how Her Majesty's Government intend to vote on the World Bank structural adjustment loan for Chile.

Mr. Eggar: No one should doubt our continuing concern over human rights abuses in Chile. We frequently made clear to the Chilean Government, both bilaterally, in concert with our EC partners, and in the United Nations, our view that human rights there must be restored and fully respected. Our concerns were expressed most recently before the General Assembly on 18 November.

We voted on 20 November in favour of the approval of the structural adjustment loan for Chile; but this was simply and solely in accordance with our established policy of voting on such loans on the basis of technical criteria and with the World Bank's articles of agreement which require it to take decisions exclusively on the basis of economic considerations. Her Majesty's Ambassador has simultaneously made clear to the Chilean Government that our concerns over their human rights record are in no way diminished.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing (Newry and Armagh)

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for housing transfer have been made in the area administered by the Newry (Urban)

Housing Executive office during each of the past five years; how many of these were subsequently withdrawn; and how many were succesful.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for housing allocation and transfer in (a) Armagh and (b) Newry during the past two years have been accompanied by supportive medical opinion; in how many of these has additional specialist medical opinion been sought by the Southern Area Board's medical assessor; and in how many of these has a home visit been made as part of the assessment.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and I am informed by the chairman that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Day Centres

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to provide an increased number of staff at day centres for the elderly.

Mr. Needham: Health and social services boards are responsible for determining appropriate staffing levels within their facilities.

Hospitals (Acute Beds)

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland by how many beds he intends to increase the acute bed complement for hospitals in the Southern Health and Social Services Board area.

Mr. Needham: The southern board is at present finalising its area strategic plan for 1987-92. This will indicate the board's views on the number of acute beds needed in its area.

Elderly Patients (Rehabilitative Treatment)

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provisions have been made in community hospitals to provide rehabilitative treatment for elderly patients in the area administered by the Southern Health and Social Services Board.

Mr. Needham: The southern board has no hospital designated as a community hospital. There are however facilities provided for the rehabilitation of elderly patients in all of the board's acute and geriatric hospitals; these include physiotherapy and occupational therapy.

Community Employment Placements

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all community employment placements in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Viggers: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. However, through the action for community employment scheme, some 700 sponsors currently provide an average of 6,000 jobs throughout Northern Ireland. Another 1,100 jobs are provided by Enterprise Ulster.

Medical Education (Patient Care Content)

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to increase the patient care content of medical education in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: No.

Employment and Youth Training Programmes

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are employed in assisted community employment schemes and youth training programmes in (a) Newry and Armagh constituency, (b) East Belfast, (c) West Belfast, (d) Mid-Ulster, (e) Strangford and (f) Antrim East.

Mr. Viggers: Statistics for community employment schemes and the youth training programme are not maintained by parliamentary constituency. The following table sets out the numbers involved in each scheme in job-market areas related to the constituencies in question.

Youth Training Programme

Constituency	Jobmarket Area	Action for Community Employment	Enterprise Ulster	Number in Full-Time Training	Number of Applications received for Employment with Training 1986-87[1]
Newry and Armagh	Newry	500	68	552	213
	Armagh	161	24	153	142
East Belfast West Belfast	Belfast (including Newtownabbey	2,534	128	3,411	1,014
Mid-Ulster	Cookstown	87	30	61	64
	Omagh	88	40	243	106
	Strabane	166	46	165	88
Strangford	Newtownards	48	21	77	111
Antrim East	Carrickfergus	187	18	126	73
	Larne	27	18	152	93

[1] Statistics for this type of provision with the Youth Training Programme are maintained by applications received from employers and not by actual numbers in training at any one period.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people over the age of 40 years in Northern Ireland have not been engaged in full-time employment in the past five years.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people under the age of 24 years in Northern Ireland have never been engaged in full-time employment other than on youth training and associated schemes.

Mr. Viggers: The information is not readily available in the form requested. However at 9 October 1986 there were 11,117 young persons aged under 25 claiming benefit who had never been in employment since leaving full-time education; but this figure excludes any claimants who, when claiming benefit, stated that they had been at some time in employment, even if that was through a youth training or associated scheme. In addition, at the end of September 13,950 young persons were participating in the youth training programme, though some of these may have been in employment prior to joining the programme.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the Government are taking to reduce the level of unemployment in the constituency of Newry and Armagh.

Mr. Viggers: The Government, through the Industrial Development Board and Local Enterprise Development Unit, will continue to apply resources to the Newry and Armagh area as elsewhere throughout Northern Ireland to encourage the establishment of new industry and the growth of existing businesses, with the aim of securing viable enterprises and stable long-term jobs. A comprehensive range of employment and training measures is also available for both adults and young people.

Job Creation

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many jobs have been created by (a) the Industrial Development Board and (b) Local Enterprise Development Unit since June 1983 in the parliamentary constituencies of (a) Newry and Armagh, (b) Antrim North, (c) Mid-Ulster, (d) East Belfast,

Mr. Viggers: Information is not compiled on the basis of constituency areas. The following are the new jobs promoted by the Industrial Development Board in each of the district council areas shown since June 1983.

	Number
Armagh Newry and Mourne	596
Moyle Ballymoney Ballymena	531
Strabane Omagh Cookstown	549
Belfast	1,389

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will specify job creating schemes planned for West Belfast within the next year.

Mr. Viggers: There are currently 55 projects sponsored under the action for community employment scheme and three projects being operated by Enterprise Ulster in West Belfast and it is anticipated that a similar level of provision will be maintained next year. West Belfast will also continue to benefit from a number of grant schemes aimed at creating jobs, including enterprise allowance, new workers scheme and jobstart.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are in receipt of supplementary benefit in the constituencies of (a) Antrim, North, (b) Belfast, East, and since 1983.

Mr. Needham: Records relate only to social security office areas, the boundaries of which are not coterminous with those of parliamentary constituencies. However, the nearest available information is as follows:

	Antrim North	Belfast East
August 1983	9,450	8,278
July 1984	10,205	9,041
July 1985	10,121	8,535
July 1986	10,775	8,914

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce details of special financial and employment assistance for Newry and Armagh comparable to the measures announced for the Carrickfergus area in the recent past; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The Department of Economic Development announced in June 1986 an increase from 45 per cent. to 50 per cent. in the maximum rate of industrial development grant available in the Carrickfergus area. This rate, which is the highest available in Northern Ireland, already applied to the Newry and Armagh area.

In September the IDB announced a new initiative aimed at stimulating industrial development at local level by working closely with community organisations. The initiative is being tested in two areas—Londonderry and Carrickfergus— on a pilot basis and, if successful, will be extended to other areas in Northern Ireland.

Redundancy

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give for each of the last six years the number of redundancies notified to the Department of Economic Development, the total number of jobs involved and the number of company closures by district council area in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Prosecutions (Photographic Identification)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary intends, in the light of the riotous scenes and lootings in Belfast after a rally on 15

November, to use photographs to identify those involved for use as evidence against them in any prosecutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Royal Ulster Constabulary inquiries into offences committed during and after the rally in Belfast City Centre on 15 November are continuing. I understand that the police are making full use of the photographic and video records available to them.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the total spending of his Department on press and public relations in the current year; and what it was in 1979-80 and each intervening year.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1986, c. 257]: The total expenditure for the current financial year is estimated at £658,500

The actual expenditure on general promotional activities and staff costs for the earlier years by part of the information service which covers the Northern Ireland Office, Belfast and the Northern Ireland Departments was as follows:

1985-86	482,473
1984-85	421,824
1983-84	420,779
1982-83	421,696
1981-82	415,957
1980-81	455,873
1979-80	344,181

Information about expenditure by members of the information service in London and all accommodation costs have not been kept separately and could be extracted only at disproportionate cost.

THE ARTS

Payroll Giving

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about charitable funding of the arts through payroll giving.

Mr. Luce: A number of organisations have expressed their interest in establishing how the arts can benefit from payroll giving. The draft regulations have just been published by the Inland Revenue. My office is now working on an explanatory leaflet which will encourage arts bodies to identify ways in which they can use the new arrangements. I hope that this leaflet will stimulate substantial participation in payroll schemes.

Arts and Libraries Budget

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Minister for the Arts, what has been the change in real terms in his budget for arts and libraries since 1979-80.

Mr. Luce: Central Government expenditure on the arts and libraries programme will have increased by nearly 28 per cent. in real terms in the period from 1979-80 to 1987-88. This figure includes additional central funding following the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan county councils. Excluding that provision, the real increase will be some 13 per cent.

Donations (Tax Incentives)

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister for the Arts what action he is taking to ensure that arts bodies and businesses know about the new tax incentives available to encourage giving to the arts.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget of 18 March introduced several benefits for charities. One allows companies tax relief on single gifts of up to 3 per cent. of pre-tax dividends, including donations to capital projects. The other allows tax relief from April 1987 on payroll deductions by individuals up to £100. Last month my office published a leaflet "Tax Benefits for the Arts" which is available free of charge. This offers advice to arts bodies on how to approach companies who may be interested in using the new arrangements. I have also written personally to many of the country's business men to draw their attention to the importance for the arts of the new reliefs. I hope to issue a leaflet on payroll giving and the arts early next year.

Scottish National Orchestra

Mr. Craigen asked the Minister for the Arts what has been the cash grant towards the Scottish National Orchestra for each of the past five years and forthcoming in respect of 1987-88.

Mr. Luce: The cash grant to the Scottish National Orchestra over the last five years has been:

1981-82	763,500
1982-83	870,500
1983-84	927,300
1984-85	977,000
1985-86	1,270,000
1986-87	1,331,700

The Scottish Arts Council is not yet in a position to determine its grant to the orchestra for 1987-88 because the Arts Council has not yet made its allocation to the Scottish Arts Council.

EC Ministers of Culture

Mr. Greenway asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the European Community Ministers of Culture held on 13 November.

Mr. Luce: I am pleased to report that a meeting of Ministers responsible for culture affairs within the European Community took place on 13 November under my chairmanship. We had a useful exchange of views over a range of cultural issues, and reached agreement on four resolutions. These encourage interest in, and Community co-operation on, business sponsorship of the arts, the conservation of works of art, the protection of the architectural heritage of Europe, and European Cinema and Television Year 1988. I was delighted that my European colleagues also warmly endorsed the United Kingdom nomination of Glasgow as the "European City of Culture" in 1990.

SCOTLAND

Priority Treatment Areas

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of areas of priority treatment in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Glasgow.

Mr. Ancram: A list of eligible areas throughout Scotland for urban programme purposes is currently being compiled in consultation with local authorities. The term "area for priority treatment" is used only by Strathclyde regional council for its own purposes.

Legal Aid

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people have been refused legal aid by the Glasgow sheriff and district courts in the past year.

Mr. Lang: In the year to 31 March 1986, 354 people were refused legal aid at Glasgow sheriff court and 1,484 at Glasgow district court.

Forestry

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will publish the names and locations of areas of 10 hectares or more in Caithness and Sutherland which have received approval for planting grants under the forestry grants scheme since February 1985, giving the hectarage in each case;

(2) what is his latest estimate of total receipts to March 1989 for the Forestry Commission's disposal of plantations and planting land; and whether he intends to revise the guidelines on the selection of areas for disposal;

(3) if he will publish the names, location and areas of woodlands in Caithness and Sutherland awarded or approved for grants since March 1985 under the Forestry Commission's dedication schemes, basis I, II and III.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

AIDS

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the preventative treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Mackay: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a number of representations concerning public education and counselling about this disease; but there is as yet no prophylactic treatment for AIDS and I have not received any representations on this subject.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many aquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers died in Scotland in 1983, 1984, 1985 and in the first eight months of 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: The Registrar General is aware, from the cause of death given by certifying doctors at death registration, of eight deaths for the period in question where acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) has been mentioned—0 in 1983, 2 in 1984, 1 in 1985 and 5 in the first eight months of 1986. The communicable diseases (Scotland) unit (Ruchill Hospital, Glasgow) is aware of 13 cases of AIDS sufferers.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were treated for acquired immune deficiency syndrome in hospitals and clinics in Scotland in 1984, 1985 and up to the latest date available in 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Year	Number of patients
1984	5
1985	4
1986[1]	7

[1] To 31 October.

Four of these patients were first diagnosed and registered while resident outside Scotland but have subsequently been treated in Scotland.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, if he will give his estimate of the total number of jobs or full-time equivalents in each of the Scottish food, drink and tobacco industries.

Mr. Lang: The estimated number of persons employed in Scotland in the food, drink and tobacco industries—classes 41 and 42 of the 1980 standard industrial classification—for 1984, the latest at present available, are set out below. Figures for some industries have been aggregated in order to prevent disclosure of information to individual businesses.

Industry	Estimated employment
Meat and poultry processing	9,900
Fish processing	5,100
Bread and flour confectionery	15,000
Sugar and confectionery	2,700
Biscuits	5,400
Milk and milk products	3,500
Fruit and vegetable processing	1,200

SOCIAL SERVICES

Drug Addicts (Beds)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many in-patient beds there are for registered drug addicts in South East Hampshire.

Mrs. Currie: The Portsmouth and South East Hampshire Health authority is responsible for the in-patient treatment of drug misusers in south east Hampshire. They have a one-bed drug misuse unit. Most people admitted for drug misuse are however treated in general psychiatric wards, and not in beds specifically assigned for drug misusers. I understand that in 1985 there were two admissions to the drug dependency unit and 45 other admissions for drug dependence.

Action on Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what meetings he or his officials have had with representatives from Action on Alcohol Abuse since July 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: There have been no meetings between representatives of Action on Alcohol Abuse and Ministers of this Department since July 1985. The last meeting between representatives of Action on Alcohol Abuse and officials was on 18 July 1985. I have, however, received a request recently and we hope to arrange a meeting soon.

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what applications since April he has received for public funds from Action on Alcohol Abuse; what has been his response; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: No application for public funds has been received from Action on Alcohol Abuse since April.

Health Education Council

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairman of the Health Education Council; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Fowler: I met Sir Brian Bailey on Thursday 20 November to discuss my announcement today about the reconstitution of the Health Education Council as a special health authority.

British Medical Association

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairman of the British Medical Association; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Newton: We often meet senior members of the medical profession to discuss issues of current interest. I last met Dr. John Marks, chairman of the Council of the British Medical Association, on 27 October to exchange views on a range of topical matters.

Salford Health Authority

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to provide the hon. Member for Eccles with a copy of the PA management consultants' report on Salford Health Authority; if he will arrange for a copy of the report to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to provide the hon. Member for Worsley with a copy of the PA management consultants' report on Salford Health Authority; if he will arrange for a copy of the report to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to provide the hon. Member for Salford, East with a copy of the PA management consultants' report on Salford Health Authority; if he will arrange for a copy of the report to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The report on the Salford situation by PA management consultants was commissioned by the North Western Regional Health authority. The right hon. and hon. Members may therefore wish to approach the chairman of the regional health authority with their request for a copy.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he anticipates honouring housing benefit claims submitted by district councils in respect of residents in local authority owned homes in the period prior to 28 July.

Mr. Major: The Department makes monthly payments on account to local authorities to enable them to award benefit under the housing benefits scheme, but authorities' entitlement to subsidy is not established until after the end of the financial year when final audited claims have been received by the Department. Authorities' final subsidy claims for housing benefit expenditure in 1985-86, including amounts in respect of residents in local authority accommodation, were due to be submitted by 31 October and will be settled in the normal way.

Final claims for expenditure incurred in the current financial year are not due until October 1987. In the meantime payments on account of subsidy are being withheld on certain benefit expenditure which the Department is not satisfied has been paid in accordance with the housing benefit regulations.

AIDS

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many acquired immune deficiency syndrome sufferers died in England and Wales in 1983, 1984, 1985 and in the first eight months of 1986;

(2) how many people were treated for acquired immune deficiency syndrome in hospitals and clinics in England and Wales in 1984, 1985 and up to the latest date available in 1986;

(3) what recent representations he has received concerning the preventative treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Returns)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what dates in each year since 1979 SBH 203 returns for 31 March have been published by his Department.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November c. 77]: The SBH 203 returns for 31 March were made available on the following dates:

Year	Date
1979	Not recorded
1980	22 April 1981
1981	12 January 1982
1982	9 Februray 1983
1983	9 December 1983
1984	30 October 1984
1985	29 October 1985

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the thing which his Department told telephone enquirers on 7 November was delaying the publication of SBH 203 returns for 31 March.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November c. 77]: The Department has been unable to identify the telephone call or calls to which the hon. Member is referring.

Health Authorities (Returns)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when his Department received the last SBH 203 return from a district health authority for 31 March;

(2) what are the differences between the total hospital waiting list figures for 31 March published by his Department and the total of the lists as submitted by district health authorities in their SBH 203 returns.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 November c. 77]: The figures on the hospital waiting list returns submitted by district health authorities are validated by the Department, in consultation with the regional health authorities, to eliminate obvious recording errors. The last SBH 203 return for 31 March 1986 was received from a district in mid-August, but changes arising from the validation process continued until late last month.

I have today placed details of national, regional and district waiting list figures for 31 March 1986 in the Library of the House. By comparison with earlier figures in the series, additional work has been done to make the presentation more helpful to hon. Members, in particular by including a 10-year graph which shows trends in waiting times and activity as well as in waiting lists; figures for changes over the latest year as well as the latest six months; and to give as percentages of the appropriate totals the numbers of cases waiting more than a month and more than a year.

While the number of patients on the in-patient hospital waiting list in England in March 1986, at 673,107, was slightly lower than a year earlier, it was 1·8 per cent. higher than at the end of September 1985. It is however encouraging that waiting times fell both over the year from March 1985 and over the six months from September 1985. For example, non-urgent cases on the list for more than a year fell, as a percentage of all cases, from 25·4 per cent. on 31 March 1985 to 24·2 per cent. on 30 September 1985 and 24 per cent. on 31 March 1986.

As the hon. Member is aware, my right hon. Friend recently announced that £50 million has been set aside over the next two years to assist in a major drive to reduce waiting lists and times which health authorities have been asked to undertake.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 105

SESSION 1986-87

12th November—21st November 1986

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
